Junius nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. years hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephta's narration: when he makes a brief repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. years: and not onely the time in which Israel possest Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephta's own words: of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480. years, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet find a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Jephta's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephta's three hundred years of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembred, that for a good while before the Israelites possessed it, Sehon and Og had dispossessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Jephta might say, that they had possessed those Countries 300. years, reckoning 266. years of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

Junius in 11. of Judg. annot.

The second place disputed is this of Saint Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Josua, to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. years. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Functius Krentzhemius, and Beza) for I have not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last year of Heli, but 357. years: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6. is said to be 480. years.

Read the 24. of Jos. and the 2. of Judg. 7. Funct. Chro. f. 4. Beza in his annotations upon the 13. of Act. v. 10.

Now forasmuch as Saint Paul (as it seems) finds 450. years from the death of Josua to the last of Heli, and leaves but thirty years for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole years ere that the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was errour in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of Saint Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death of Josua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint Luke, rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. years (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. years for 300. years; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Josua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. years: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons years) 319. and of years of servitude and affliction under strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty years, is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40. years, in which the Philistims are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plain, that during all Sampsons time, they were Lords over Israel.

Judg. 15. 11.

Iſrael. So then of the Judges, beſides the 111. years of ſervitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have ſaid) 319. years, which two ſums put together, make 430. years And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. years, he finds 20. years to make up Saint Paul's number, to have been ſpent after the death of Joſua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Cuſhan, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. years added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Joſua, and the ſecond of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Iſrael ſerved the Lord all the dayes of Joſua, and all the dayes of the Elders that over-lived Joſua: ſo as to theſe times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20. years, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficulty in this opinion, if here alſo the 20. years of the Seniors between Joſua and Othoniel ſhould be denied. For they which deny theſe years, and make Othoniels 40. to begin preſently upon the death of Joſua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they have 20. years leſs than Codoman, ſo toward the end of it (when they reckon the years of affliction apart from the years of the Judges) in the number of Sampſons years, and of the forty years of the Philiſtims oppreſſing the Iſraelites, they have 20. years more than Codoman. For they reckon theſe 40. years of oppreſſion all of them a-part from Sampſons 20. but Codoman, as is ſaid, makes Sampſons 20. to be the one half of the forty of the Philiſtims oppreſſions; ſo that if the 20. years of the Seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text ſeems to inforce) that the Philiſtims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampſon judged Iſrael, vexed the Iſraelites 40. years, beſides the 20. while Sampſon was their Judge; and ſo the reckoning will come to 450. years between the end of Joſua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors between Joſua and Othoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be ſummed, they make 111. years, to which if we add the years of the Judges, which are 339. we have the juſt ſum of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may ſeem to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we ſhould admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350. years, is to begin immediately, or ſoon after the death of Moſes: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was vitium ſcriptoris in the reſt. For theſe be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of forty years, God ſuffered their manners in the wilderneſs: and he deſtroyed ſeven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as firſt in the eighteenth verſe he ſpeaketh of Moſes, and of his years ſpent in the Wilderneſs, then in the nineteenth verſe he cometh unto the acts of Joſua; which were, that he deſtroyed ſeven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth Verſe it followeth, Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450. years, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moſes, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, ſo far as my weak underſtanding can pierce it. The onely inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it ſeems irreconcileable with the account, 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were ſpent 450. years between the end of Joſua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there muſt needs be much more than 480. years between the beginning of the Iſraelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Solomon. To this difficulty Codoman anſwereth, that theſe 480. years, 1 Reg. 6. 1. muſt begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. years after the beginning of Othoniels government; from whence if we caſt the years of the Judges, with the years of ſervitude (which ſums, according to his account, of which we have already ſpoken, make 397. years) and ſo to theſe years add the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of David, and the 3. of Solomon, we ſhall have the juſt ſum of 480. years. Neither is it hard, ſaith he, that the annus egreſſionis, 1 Kings 6. 1. ſhould be underſtood egreſſionis non incipientis, ſed finitæ, the year of their coming out of Egypt (for ſo it is in the original) or the year after they came out of Egypt, may well be underſtood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For ſo we find that things which were done forty years after they had ſet foot out of Egypt, are ſaid to have been done in their going out of Egypt; as Pſal. 114. When Iſrael came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Deut. 4. 45, Theſe are the teſtimonies which Moſes ſpake when they came out of Egypt. And thus far Joſ. 14. 1.

it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiviſſent, or ab exitu finito: for if Junius, Deut. 4.45. do well read quum exiviſſent, for in exitu, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, poſtquam exiviſſent?

The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to have had end until the 25. year after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end, till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is *Judg.*18.1 declared, Judg. 18. For doubtless to this time the Expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephta, and of Saint Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is said, that the Expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel lived all those 40. years of rest, of which Judg. 3.11. so that by the 25. year after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might have refused all Soveraignty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. year after Othoniels victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers, grounding their opinions on the plain Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it self round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they sound, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all help of authority, we may justly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to shew that Othoniel did so renounce the office of a Judge after five and twenty years, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes?

Now concerning the rehearsal of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Egypt: like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land, for so all journies with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I think that he can find no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a journey by an accident, or saith by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most unproper it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely, to say, that King Edward at his arrival out of Palæstina did win Scotland, or died at Carlile. How may we then believe that enterprize performed so many years after the division of the Land (which followed the conquest at the journies end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the onely guide for certain ages in sacred Chronology, should not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principal of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the year and moneth wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by six hundred men, that robbed a Chappel by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods Name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it best stood with his interpretation so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it self.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been been the true Meſſias) the Apoſtle was ſo far from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the Hiſtory being ſo well known and beleived of the Jews to whom he preached) that he ſpake as it were at large of the 40. years conſumed in the Wilderneſs, whereof no man doubted, ſaying, that God ſuffered their manners in the Wilderneſs about 40. years. In like manner he proceeded, ſaying, that from the diviſion of the Land unto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whoſe time they required to have a King, there paſſed about 450. years. Neither did he ſtand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven years of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. years of the Judges: for this had been an impertinent digreſſion from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work ſo needful as laborious, to ſearch out of this place that which the Apoſtle did not here intend to teach, when the ſum of 480. years is ſo expreſly and purpoſely ſet down.

Now that the vvords of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of ſome Scribe) are not ſo curiouſly to be examined in matter of Chronology, but muſt be taken, as having reference to the memory and apprehenſion of the vulgar, it is evident by his aſcribing in the ſame place 40. years to the reign of Saul: whereas it is manifeſt that thoſe years vvere divided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that far the greater part of them vvere ſpent under the government of the Prophet, howſoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for thoſe that vvith ſo much cunning forſake the general opinion, vvhen it favoureth not ſuch expoſition as they bring out of a good mind, to help vvhere the need is not over-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The vvords of S. Paul vvere ſufficiently juſtified by Beroaldus, as having reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in thoſe days, that the 111. years of ſervitude vvere to be reckoned apart from the 339. years aſcribed to the Judges; vvhich account the Apoſtle vvould not in this place ſtand to contradict, but rather choſe to ſpeak as the vulgar, qualifying it vvith a quaſi, where he ſaith, quaſi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, vvould needs have it be ſo indeed, and therefore diſ-joyns the members to make the account even. In ſo doing he daſheth himſelf againſt a notable Text, whereupon all Authors have builded, (as well they might and ought) that purpoſely and preciſely doth caſt up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very moneth it ſelf.

1 King. 6.

Now (as commonly the firſt apprehenſions are ſtrongeſt) having already given faith to his own interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find ſome new expoſition for that vvhich is of it ſelf moſt plain, and to examine his own conjecture upon a place that is full of controverſie. Thus by expounding after a ſtrange Method, that vvhich is manifeſt by that vvhich is obſcure, he loſeth himſelf in thoſe vvayes vvherein before him never man vvalked. Surely if one ſhould urge him to give reaſon of theſe new opinions, he muſt needs anſwer, that Othoniel could not govern above 25. years, becauſe then vvas the taking of Laiſh; at which time there was no King in Iſrael; That the Danites muſt needs have taken Laiſh at that time, becauſe elſe we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Iſrael out of Egypt, vvithout excluding the years of ſervitude; And that the years of ſervitude muſt needs be included, for that otherwiſe he himſelf ſhould have ſpent his time vainly, in ſeeking to pleaſure S. Paul with an expoſition. Whether this ground be ſtrong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the deciſion of the judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our ſtory. To the time of Jephta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the proviſions which her huſband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycenæ, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ibzan: from which time, if the war of Troy (as they ſuppoſe) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had ſix years to prepare themſelves: the rule holding not true in this War, Longa præparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a ſpeedy victory: for the Greeks conſumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy, as it ſeems, was entred, ſackt, and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy taken, which was in the ſixt year of Habdon, Æneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule, died, after he had been the Father of 40. ſons, and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is ſuppoſed, that the 40. years of Iſraels oppreſſion by the Philiſtims (of which Judg. 13. v. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year year of Jair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrel against Jephta, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in servitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppress: and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistims with so powerful an Army for their own deliverance, than against their own brethren the Israelites? but Ammon being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. years must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterward: or else they must be referred to the Interregnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Sampson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the War of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets, how they have observed historical truth.

THE War at Troy, with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this City, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned,) I rather choose here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal descent of their Princes, than to break the story into peices by rehearsing a-part in divers years, the diversity of occurrents.

The History of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their original, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two Founders of that Kingdom. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it rests upon the authority of Virgil, who saith thus:

Creta Jovis magni medio jacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostræ.
Centum Urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde Pater (si ritè audita recordor)
Teucrus Rhœteas primum est advectus ad oras:
Optavitque locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arces.
Pergameæ stetерant: habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybaniaque æra, Idæumque nemus.

Æneid. 3.

In the main Sea the Ile of Creete doth lie;
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.
There is a mount Ida: there in fruitful Land
An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our grand-fires came
To the Rhœtean shores: and reigned there,
Ere yet fair Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought
In lowest Vales. Hence Cybels rites were brought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remove;
And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Teucer first gave name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same book he speaks thus:

Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere glebæ,
Oenotrii coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Jasiusque Pater, genus à quo principe nostrum.

Hesperia the Græcians call the place:
An ancient fruitful Land, a warlike race,
Oenotrians

Oenotrians held it: now the later progeny
Gives it their Captains name, & calls it Italy;
This seat belongs to us; hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of your stock, Jasius.

Atque equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis
Aruncos ita fere senes, hic ortus ad agris
Dardanus Idæus Phrygiæ penetravit ad urbes,
Threiciamque Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum,
Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Some old Aruncans, I remember well,
(Though time have made the fame obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how born in Italy,
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leaving Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did sail to Samothrace;
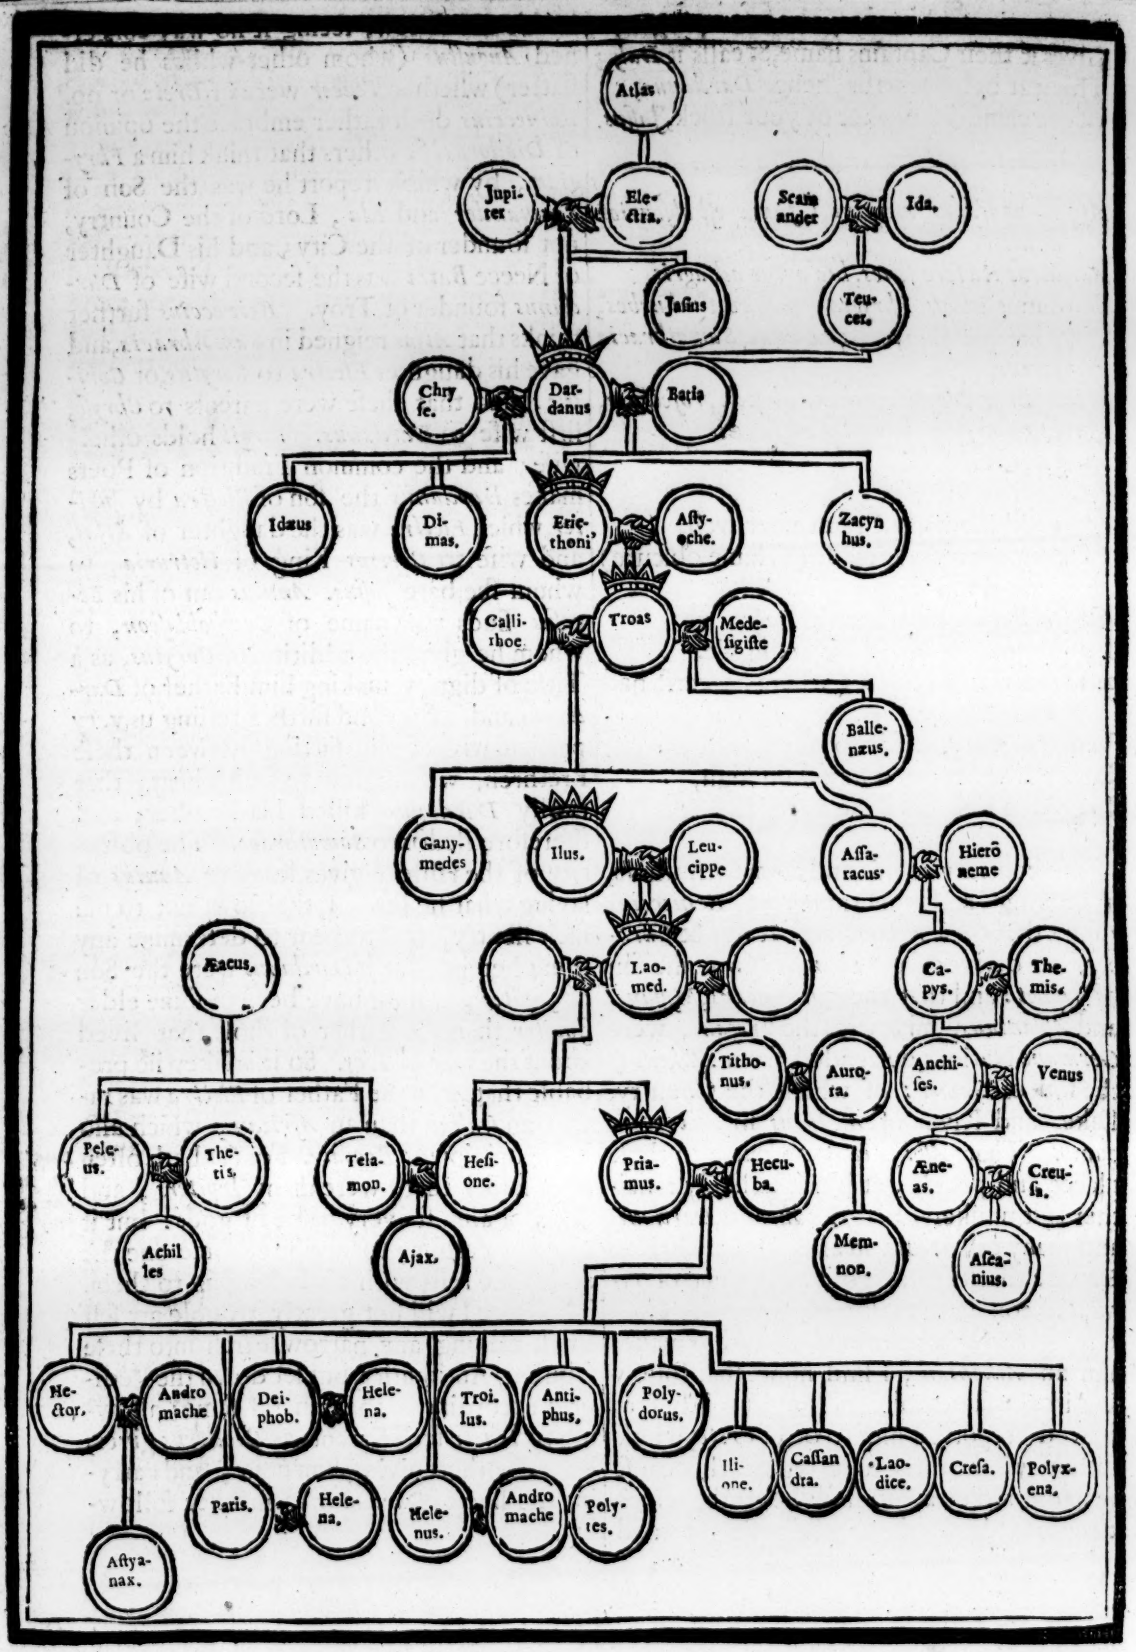
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starry Sky.

But contrary to this, and so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucri, & Thraces, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the son of Japhet: and that the Dardanians, Mysians, and Ascanians, mixt with the Trojans, were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the son of Gomer: of whom the Country, Lake, and River of Ascanius in Asia took name. That Ashkenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times pass into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tyras, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassæus makes him an Athenian, I find none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reported him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to find the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, & others that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Country, not founder of the City; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise; and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the son of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Jasius. Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he gives the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jasius; and further telling us very particularly of the faction between these Brethren, which grew to such a heat, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and therefore fled into Somothrace. The obscurity of the History gives leave to Annius of saying what he list. I, that love not to use such liberty, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those, that lived about the war of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of gods: but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow search into these fabulous Antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the general fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus gives, because others giving him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Deor. l. 4. c. 3. Boccace de gen.



Concerning the beginning & continuance of the Trojan Kingdom, with the length of every Kings reign, I have chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a History, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and general passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that City whilst it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. years more ancient then the beginning of the ninty fourth Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372.

372. did pass between the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first year of the 94. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. years, that is, 408. years vvent between the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authority of Diodorus be good proof, vvho elsewhere tels us, that the return of the Heraclidæ, vvhich vvas 80. years after the fall of Troy, vvas 328. years before the first Olympiad.

Diod. in præf.

Hereunto agrees the authority of Dionysius Halicarnasseus, vvho placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiad, that is, four and twenty years after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later then the fall of Troy. Solinus in expres words, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, vvhom he calleth Iphiclus, 480. years later than the destruction of Troy. The sum is easily collected by necessary inference out of divers other places in the same book. Hereunto doth Eusebius, reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes (as is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes up out of many particulars, the same total sum, vvanting, but one year, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

Cle. Alex. Strom. lib. 1.

The other collections of divers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, do neither cohere any vvay, nor depend upon any collateral History, by vvhich they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the year before the Olympiads four hundred & eight: vve must seek the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Eusebius, who leads us from Dardanus on-wards, through the reigns of four Kings, by the space of two hundred and five and twenty years, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed under Laomedon, we are fain to do as others have done before us, and take it upon trust from Annius his Authors; believing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings reigns, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may give us leave to think that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no History or account of time depends upon the reign of the former Kings, but only upon the ruins of the City under Priamus, it may suffice that we are careful to place that memorable accident in the due year.

True it is, that some objections appearing weighty, may be alledged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those years, wherein the Greeks knew no good form of a year; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprise that was undertaken by general consent of all Greece, was the last war of Troy, which hath been famous even to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there assembled, the great battails fought with variable success; the long endurance of the siege; the destruction of that great City; and the may Colonies planted in sundry countries, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate return. All which things, with enumerable circumstances of especial note, have been delivered unto posterity; by the excellent wits of many Writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose Verses have given immortality to the action, which might else perhaps have been buried in oblivion; among other worthy deeds, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith:

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, sed omnes illacrymabiles
Urgentur, ignotiq; longa
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.

Many by valour have deserv'd renown
Ere Agamemnon; yet lie all oppresst
Under long night, unwept for, and unknown:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst these Writers have with strange fables, or (to speak the best of them) with Allegories far strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawn into suspition that great vertue which they sought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seek for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose works are both profit and delight; yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise: but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great war. All Writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking Arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtful.

§. II.

Of the rape of Helen : and strength of both sides for the War.

HErodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very far; saying, That whereas the Phœnecians had ravished Iö, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks, to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medæa, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened to do the like; not fearing such revenge as ensued. But all this narration seems frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to do with the injury of the Phœnicians? Or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrel against him, that never had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable sincerity, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homers time, which was long after the War of Troy: and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have sought revenge upon all Nations, as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the World; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true: for Telamon (as it seems) was a cruel man, seeing his own son Teucer durst not come in his sight, after the war of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus her brother would seek to take her from her husband, with whom she had lived about thirty years, and to whom she had born children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medæa, or Hesione, but was meerly incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to do that which in those daies was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discourseth; but all people were accustomed to steal Women and Cattel, if they could by strong hand or power get them: and having stoln them, either to sell them away in some far Country, or keep them to their own use. So did Theseus and Pirythons attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neer unto the Sea, for fear of pyracy, which was accounted a trade of life no less lawful than merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus, the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her Wooers, who were most of the principal men in Greece, to bind themselves by solemn oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping: for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus; was Lord of many Islands: he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his own ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take Arms against the Trojans. The Greeks Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayl, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks; only they used (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fifty men, the greatest 120. every man (except Captains) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian Army consisted of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest Army that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatness of this Army doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the City, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads; but their followers and aids were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Missia, and the greatest part of Asia the less, took part with the Trojans. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some think out of Æthiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helena's being detained in Egypt, and of the sacrificing of Iphigenia.

WHerefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to tryal of arms, if things might be compounded by treaty, sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadours to Troy: who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain, Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The sum of his discourse is this.

Paris in his return with Helena, being driven by foul weather unto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen, had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the war, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed she had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his wife of Proteus. Homer, and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed that he made for pleasure, and if he were driven thither by contrary Winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such Winds as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until such time as the Wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the saying of the Egyptian Priests; which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madness for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the war, and so many of his sons slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was heir to the Kingdom (for Hector was elder) nor equal in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seem that Lucian spake not more pleasantly then truly, when he said that Helen, at the war of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had been ravished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to have been twins) who sailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their company, before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principal commander in the Trojan war. But whether it were so that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadours returned ill contented, and not very well entreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to have been a Runagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captains, and all the Hoast with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnons daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrifized, or whether (as some write) the goddess was contented with a Hind, it is not needful here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the Devil, which waits for all opportunities, is never more importunate, then where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatall impediments were removed: and that till ten years were past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise, under the command of Agamemnon; who was accompanied with his Brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix, Ajax and Teucer, the sons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor and his sons Antilochus and Thrasymides; Ulysses, Mnestheus the son of Petreus, Captain of the Athenians; Diomedes the ſon of Tydeus, a man of ſingular courage; the wiſe and learned Palamedes, Aſcalaphus, and Jalmenus, the ſons of Mars, who had ſailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes alſo the ſon of Pæan, who had the arrows of Hercules, without which Calchas ſaid, that the City could not be taken, Ajax the ſon of Oileus, Peneleus, Theas, Eumelus, Tyſandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the ſon of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the ſons of Æſculapius; Epeus, who is ſaid to have made the wooden Horſe, by which the town was taken; and Proteſilaus, who firſt leapt on ſhore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed firſt.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of the Græcians at the ſiege.

THeſe, and many other of leſs note, arriving at Troy, found ſuch ſharp entertainment, as might eaſily perſwade them to think that the war would be more than one years work. For in the firſt encounter, they loſt Proteſilaus, whom Hector ſlew, and many others, without any great harm done to the Trojans: ſave only that by their numbers of men, they wan ground enough to incamp themſelves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principal impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reaſon of their multitude, and the ſmalneſs of their veſſels, wherein they could not carry neceſſaries for ſuch an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to ſend ſome part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherroneſs: others to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the war protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmiſhes were, yet could the town receive little loſs by them, having equal numbers to maintain the field againſt ſuch Greeks as continued the ſiege, and a more ſafe retrait if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid ſaith, That from the firſt year, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, and Heraclide commends as very credible, the report of Herodicus, that the Greeks did not lye before Troy the firſt nine years: but onely did bear up and down the Seas, exerciſing their men, and inriching themſelves, and ſo by waſting the enemies country did block up the Town, unto which they returned not, untill the fatall time drew near when it ſhould be ſubverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them; and therefore ſitting upon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been ſuppoſed that he ſhould be ignorant of them, if they had ſhewed themſelves before the town ſo many years together. Hom. Iliad. 3.

Between theſe relations of Thucidides and Herodicus, the difference is not much, the one ſaying, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whileſt the reſt made purveyance by land and by ſea: the others that the whole army did ſpend the time in waſting the Sea-coaſts. Neither do the Poets greatly diſagree from theſe authors: for they make report of many towns and Ilands waſted, and the people carried into Captivity; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the army could not well, nor would have ſpared, if any ſervice of importance had been to be performed before the City. Howſoever it was, this is agreed by general conſent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great peſtilence aroſe among the Greeks: which Homer ſaith, that Apollo ſent in revenge of his Prieſts daughter, whom Agamemnon had refuſed to let go, for any ranſome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, ſaith, that by Apollo was meant the Sun, who raiſed peſtilent Fogs, by which the army was infected, being lodged in a mooriſh piece of ground. And it might well be that the camp was over-peſtered with thoſe, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all cloſe together: having alſo grounded their ſhips within the fortifications.

About the ſame time aroſe much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as General, having firſt choſen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the ſecond place choſen for himſelf another, then Ajax, Ulyſſes, and ſo the reſt of the chief Captains in order: when the South-ſayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman ſhould be reſtored to her father Apollo's Prieſt, that ſo the peſtilence might ceaſe, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and ſay, that he alone would not loſe his part of the ſpoile, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulyſſes. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to ſuffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by ſtrong hand, nor to revenge her loſſe otherwiſe than by refuſing to fight, or to ſend forth his Captains. But the Greeks, encouraged encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the City without him and his Troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aid: partly drawn to that War by their Commanders who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the War began (as appears by his words in Homer,) or for love of himself and his sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair Daughters; partly also (as we may well gheese) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks when they wasted the Countries adjoyning unto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the Town, he was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or quality of their Leaders. The principal Captains in the Trojan Army, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sons of Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his sons, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the sons of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrival; Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the War. Between these and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tomb of King Ilus upon the Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Camp, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the son of Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the only men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another battel (for so Antiquity cals it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles Troops, relieving the weary Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomædes, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of those Wars, having slain a man, to strip him, and hale away his body, not restoring it without ransome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their Captains; who rode not upon horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three horses, which were guided by some trusty followers of theirs, which drave up and down the field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftness of their horses, presenting themselves where need required, threw first their Javelins, and then alighting, fought on foot, with swords and battle-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their arms defensive were helmets, breast-plates, boots of brass, or other mettal, and shields commonly of leather plated over. The offensive were swords and battel-axes at hand; and stones, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftness) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest ware heaviest, also that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which Weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; every man (speaking of the chief) carried his own compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Captain whom he had slain, and stripped; or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himself unto Achilles, not only restoring his concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battel Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not only put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be believed) he chased three times about the Wals of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the City (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the Rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that flight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Hector in such an extremity, would have for-born to open ſome of their gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who having (by what means ſoever) ſlain the noble Hector, did not only carry away his dead body, as the cuſtome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thruſting leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him ſhamefully about the field, ſelling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranſome. But his cruelty and covetouſneſs were not long unrevenged; for he was ſhortly after ſlain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer ſayes in the Scæan Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with vvhom he vvas too far in love, having ſlain ſo many of her brethren; and his body was ranſomed (as Lycophron ſaith) at the ſelfſame rate that Hectors was by him ſold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after ſome proof given of her Valour, was ſlain by Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horſe, the Book of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

FInally, after the death of many Worthy Perſons on each ſide, the City was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the Treaſon of Æneas and Antenor; or by a wooden Horſe, as the Poets, and common Fame (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write that upon one of the gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the Image of a Horſe, and that the Greeks entring by that gate, gave occaſion to the report, that the City was taken by an artificial Horſe. It may well be that with ſome wooden Engine, which they called a Horſe, they either did batter the Wals as the Romans in after-times uſed to do with the Ram: or ſcaled the Wals upon the ſudden, and ſo took the City. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden Horſe, it had been a deſperate adventure, and ſerving to no purpoſe. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and ſlain all thoſe Princes of Greece, that were incloſed in it (which alſo by ſuch as maintain this report they are ſaid to have thought upon:) or they might have left it a few dayes without the City (for it was unlikely, that they ſhould the very firſt day both conclude upon the bringing it into the Town, and break down their Wals upon the ſudden to do it:) by which means they who were ſhut into it, muſt have periſhed for hunger, if they had not by iſſuing forth unſeaſonably diſcovered the invention. Whereas further it is ſaid, that this Horſe was ſo high and great, that it could not be brought into the Town through any of the gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their Wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greeks did afterwards enter; it is hereby manifeſt, that the incloſing of ſo many principal men was altogether needleſs, conſidering that without their help there was way ſufficient for the Army; ſo that the ſurpriſing of any gate by them was now to no purpoſe.

John Baptiſta Gramay in his Hiſtory of Aſia, diſcourſing of this War, ſaith that the Greeks did both batter the Wals with a Wooden Engine, and were alſo let into the City by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the Townſmen ſleeping and drinking without fear or care, becauſe the fleet of the Grecians had hoiſted ſail, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into ſecurity. That the City was betrayed, the Books of Dares and Dyctis muſt prove, which whether we now have the ſame that were by them written, it may be ſuſpected; for ſurely they who have made mention of theſe Writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictory in moſt points to theſe two Authors, without once taking notice of the oppoſition, which they having ſerved in that War made againſt the common report, had it not been that either thoſe books were even in thoſe times thought frivolous, or elſe contained no ſuch repugnancy to the other Authors as now is found in them.

Alſo concerning the number of men ſlain in this War, which Dares and Dyctis ſay to have been above 600000. on the Trojan ſide, and more then 800000. of the Greeks, it is a report meerly fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their Army and deeds as much as he could, to be ſomewhat leſs than 1200. ſail, and the Army therein tranſported over the Greek ſeas, not much above 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common faſhion of men to extol the deeds of their Ancients: for which cauſe both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks that ſerved in the War, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their City, from which the Romans deſcended. Yea the Athenians long after after in the War which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Menesteus the son of Peteus had shewed in marshalling the Grecian Army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld unto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanity possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the World, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their Pedegree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability, came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Æneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Country adjoyning, by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the son of King Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth, that the Posterity of Hector did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

CONcerning the Greeks, they tasted as much misery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrival: others were debarred from the Soveraignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the Army, which, weakned much by the calamities of that long War, was of little force to repel injuries, being divided into so many pieces under several Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the booty, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set sail, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the Fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Isle of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole Fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tels, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italy. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his Wife, and by the Adulterer Ægystus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long upon the Seas, came into Ægypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poor estate, with much ado recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Ajax the son of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Daunus, who was Lord of the Japiges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africk, others into Italy, all the East part whereof was called Magna Græcia, by reason of so many Towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that Coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Græcian Ladies, whose Husbands had been at the War of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greeks suffered misery, and the unlucky City not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom Sampson, after a vacancy or Inter-regnum for certain years, succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Sampſon, Ely, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Sampſon.

2970. THE birth and acts of Sampſon are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I ſhall not need to make a repetition thereof. But theſe things I gather out of that Story. Firſt, that the Angel of God forbad the Wife of Monoah the Mother of Sampſon, to drink Wine or ſtrong drink, or to eat any unclean meat after ſhe was conceived with child; becauſe thoſe ſtrong liquors hindered the ſtrength, and as it were wither and ſhrink the child in the mothers womb. Though this were even the counſel of God himſelf, and delivered by his Angel, yet it ſeemeth that many Women of this age have not read, or at leaſt will not believe this precept: the moſt part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how ſtrong or unclean ſoever, filling themſelves with all ſorts of Wines, and with artificial drinks far more forcible: by reaſon whereof ſo many wretched feeble bodies are born into the World, and the races of the able and ſtrong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refuſed the ſacrifice which Manoah would have offered him, commanding him to preſent it unto the Lord: and therefore thoſe that profeſſe divination by the help of Angels, to whom alſo they ſacrifice, may aſſuredly know that they are devils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worſhip that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Sampſon was twice betrayed by his Wives, to wit, by their importunity and deceitful tears: by the firſt he loſt but a part of his goods; by the ſecond his life. Quem nulla vis ſuperare potuit, voluptas evertit: Whom no force could over-maſter, Voluptuouſneſs overturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Iſrael from the oppreſſion of the Philiſtims; though in ſome ſort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithſtanding that he had ſlain 30. of them in his firſt attempt, burnt their Corn in harveſt time, and given them a great overthrow inſtantly upon it: yet ſo much did Iſrael fear the Philiſtims, as they aſſembled 3000. men out of Juda, to beſiege Sampſon, in the rock or mountain of Etam, uſing theſe Words: Knoweſt not thou that the Philiſtims are Rulers over us? &c. After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philiſtims, for fear of their revenge; though he was no ſooner looſened, but he gave them another overthrow, and ſlew 1000. with the jaw-bone of an Aſſe.

Laſtly, being made blind, and a priſoner by the treaſon of his Wife, he was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his enemies, when he pulled down the pillars of the houſe at the Feaſt whereto they ſent for Sampſon, to deride him; till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly ſaid of Seneca; Patientia ſæpe læſa vertitur in furorem; Patience often wounded is converted into fury: neither is it at any time ſo much wounded by pain and loſs, as by deriſion and contumely.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Ark taken; and of Dagons fall, and the ſending back of the Ark.

THE Story of Eli the Prieſt, who ſucceeded Sampſon, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the deſtruction of his houſe, for the wickedneſs of his ſons, which he ſuppreſſed not, neither did he puniſh them according to their deſerts: whoſe ſins were horrible, both in abuſing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Levi Ben Gerſon, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the woman by the ſons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleaſed God to caſt the Iſraelites under the ſwords of the Philiſtims; of whom there periſhed in the firſt encounter 4000. and in the ſecond battel 30000. footmen; among whom the ſons of Eli being ſlain, their father (hearing the lamentable ſucceſs) by falling from his chair, brake his neck. He was the firſt that obtained the High-Prieſthood of the ſtock of Ithamar the ſon of Aaron, before whoſe time it continued ſucceſſively in the 1 Sam. 2. 22.

the race of Eleazar the eldeſt brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the firſt, Eleazar the ſecond, Phinees the ſon of Eleazar the third, Abiſue the ſon of Phinees the fourth, his ſon Bocci the fift, Ozi the ſon of Bocci the ſixt, and then Eli, as Joſephus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew Authors have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the Prieſthood continued after Eli, to the time of Salomon, who caſt out Abiathar, and eſtabliſhed Sadock and Achimaas and their ſucceſſors. The Ark of God which Iſrael brought into the field, was in this battel taken by the Philiſtims. For as David witneſſeth, God greatly abhorred Iſrael, ſo that he forſook the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c.

1 King. 2. 27. and 1 Chron. 6.

Pſal. 78.

Now as it pleaſed God at this time, that the Ark whereby himſelf was repreſented ſhould fall in the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Prieſts and people: ſo did he permit the Chaldæans to deſtroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the ſecond Temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Chriſtian Churches in Aſia and Europe. And had not the Iſraelites put more confidence in the ſacrament, or repreſentation, which was the Ark, than in God himſelf, they would have obſerved his Laws, and ſerved him onely: which whenſoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivity they had no Ark at all, nor in the times of the Macchabees: and yet for their piety it pleaſed God to make that Family as victorious as any that guarded themſelves by the ſign in ſtead of the ſubſtance. And that the Ark was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an enſign, David witneſſed when he fled from Abſalon. For when the Prieſts would have carried the Ark with him; he forbad it, and cauſed it to be turned into the City, uſing theſe words: If I ſhall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again: if not, let him do to me as ſeemeth good in his eyes.

1 Sam. 5. 6.

The Trojans believed that while their Palladium or the image of Minerva was kept in Troy, the City ſhould never be overturned: ſo did the Chriſtians in the laſt fatal battel againſt Saladine carry into the field, as they were made believe, the very Croſs whereon Chriſt died; and yet they loſt the battel, their bodies, and the wood. But Chryſoſtome upon Saint Matthew (if that be his work) giveth a good judgment, ſpeaking of thoſe that wore a part of Saint John's Goſpel about their necks, for an annulet or preſervative: Si tibi ea non proſunt in auribus, quomodo proderunt in collo? If thoſe words do not profit men in their ears (to wit, the hearing of the Goſpel preached) how ſhould it profit them by hanging it about their necks? For it was neither the wood of the Ark, nor the wood of the Croſs, but the reverence of the Father, that gave the one for a memory of his Covenant; and the Faith in his Son, which ſhed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and us, either in this life or after it.

The Philiſtims returning with the greateſt victory and glory which ever they obtained, carried the Ark of God with them to Azotus, and ſet it up in the houſe of Dagon their Idol: but that night the Idol fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the Ark. The morning following they took it up, and ſet it again in his place. And it fell the ſecond time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the arms, ſhewing that it had nor power nor underſtanding in the preſence of God; for the head fell off, which is the ſeat of reaſon and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute ſtrength) were ſundred from the arms. For God and the devil inhabit not in one houſe, nor in one heart. And if this Idol could not endure the repreſentation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at ſuch time as it pleaſed him to cover his onely begotten with fleſh, and ſent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Devil derided and betrayed mortal men, loſt power, ſpeech and operation at the inſtant. For when that true light which never had beginning of brightneſs, brake through the clouds of a Virgins body, ſhining upon the earth which had been long obſcured by Idolatry, all thoſe foul and ſtinking vapours vaniſhed. Plutarch rehearſeth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he ſtileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cauſe) he ſearcheth his brains for many reaſons of ſo great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not only this old Devil did then die as he ſuppoſed, but all the reſt, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became ſpeechleſs.

Now while the Philiſtims triumphed after this victory, God ſtrook them with the grievous diſeaſe of the Hæmorrhoides, of which they periſhed in great numbers. For it is written, that the Lord deſtroyed them. It was therefore by general conſent ordered, that the Ark ſhould be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth, another of the five great Cities of the Philiſtims; to prove, as it ſeemeth, whether this diſeaſe were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly:

1 Sam. 5. 9. but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortal. For the hand of the Lord was against this City with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the City both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Ark to Ekron or Accaron, a third City of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out, that themselves and their people should be slain thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the City. In the end, by the advice of their Priests, the Princes of the Philistims did not onely resolve to return the Ark, but to offer gifts unto the God of Israel, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardned to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his service by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be almighty, and that their own Idols were subject thereunto, they agreed to offer a sin-offering, using these words; So ye shall give glory to the God of Israel, that he may take his hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approve our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confess the living God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchadonosor and Darius, when they had seen his miracles by Daniel.

This counsel therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hæmorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch Kine to be chosen, such as had not been yoaked, and a new Cart or Carriage to be framed: but they durst not drive or direct it to any place certain, thereby to make tryal whether it were indeed the hand of God that had strucken them. For if the Ark of God were carried towards Bethshemesh, and into the territory of Israel, then they should resolve that from God onely came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Ark, could not be forced from their Calves, but that they would have followed them whersoever; much less when they were left to themselves, would they travel a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world, if calves be removed from their dams, the kine will follow them through woods and desars by the foot, till they find them. But the kine travelled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Josua of the same City, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceived, they returned to Ekron. After which, God spared not his own people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to look in the Ark. And because they knew God and his commandements, and had been taught accordingly; he strook them more grievously than he did the heathen: for there perished of them fifty thousand and seventy. From hence the Ark was carried to Kiriath-jearim, and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twenty years in the charge of Eleazar his son, until David brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the mean while the Ark was in Nob, Mispa, and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time severed from the Ark, or at least, it was for the (a) present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-jearim. 2 Sam 6. & 1 Chron. 12.

§. III.

Of Samuel, and of his Government.

THese Tragedies overpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a child, became now Judge and Governour of Israel. He was descended of the family of (b) Chore or Korach. For Levi had three sons; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram and Izaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore; and of the family of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Levite, was called an Ephratæan; not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of (c) Mount Ephraim, like as Jesse, David's father was called an Ephratæan, because born at Ephrata, or Bethleem. Hannah his mother being long fruitless, obtained him of God by prayers and tears: it being an exceeding shame to the Jewish women to be called barren, in respect of the blessing of God, both to Abraham, that his seed should multiply as the Stars of Heaven, and the sands of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomy the seventh, There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

(b) 1 Chron. 6. 22.

(c) Which Region was called Ephrata, as appeareth Jud. 12. 5. whence for distinction we read Ruth 1. Ephratæi è Bethlechemo Jehuda, the town Ephrata, which is Bethlehem in Juda, Gen. 35. 19. from the region of Ephrata, which is in Mount Ephraim, whence Psal 132. 6 Ephrata is put for Silo, which was in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Samuel was no sooner born, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his service; to which she delivered him even from the dug. For as the first-born of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five years old for five sheckles, and between five years and twenty, for twenty sheckles: so was it not required by the Law, that any of the the race of the Levites ſhould be called to ſerve about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty years old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the firſt of the Writers of holy Scriptures, to vvhom uſually this name of a Prophet vvas given, and yet did Moſes account himſelf ſuch a one; as in the 18. of Deuteronomie, The Lord thy God will raiſe up unto thee a Prophet like unto me, &c. But he is diſtinguiſhed from thoſe that preceded him, vvho were called Seers; as before time in Iſrael, when a man went to ſeek an anſwer of God, thus he ſpake; Come and let us go to the Seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleaſed God to appear by his Angels to Moſes, as before to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifeſt viſion; not that God had altogether vvithdrawn his grace from Iſrael: but as the Chaldæan Paraphraſt hath it, thoſe revelations before Samuel's time, vvere more clouded and obſcure. The places vvherein Samuel judged vvere Matſpa or Mitſpa, ſeated on a hill in Benjamin near Juda: alſo Gilgal and Bethel, of vvhich vve have ſpoken elſewhere.

The Philiſtims taking knowledge of the aſſembly and preparation of War at Mitſpa, in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their Army, and marched towards the City: at vvhoſe approach the Iſraelites ſtrucken vvith fear, and vvith the memory of their former ſlaughters and ſervitude, beſought Samuel to pray to God for them; vvho vvas * then performing his ſacrifice vvhen the Philiſtims vvere in view. But God being moved vvith Samuel's prayers (as he vvas by thoſe of Moſes, vvhen Iſrael fought againſt the Amalekites at the firſt entrance into Arabia:) it pleaſed him with thunder and tempeſt to diſperſe and beat down the Army of the Philiſtims, according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuel's Mother, The Lords adverſaries ſhall be deſtroyed, and out of Heaven ſhall he thunder upon them, &c. Joſephus affirms, that a part of the Philiſtims were ſwallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himſelf led the Iſraelites in the proſecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memory of this happy ſucceſs, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Joſephus called Lapidem fortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the ſtone of aſſiſtance: and then following the opportunity and advantage of the victory, the Iſraelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly loſt, and held long in the poſſeſſion of the Philiſtims, who for a long time after did not offer any invaſion or revenge. And the better to attend their purpoſes, and to withſtand any of their attempts, the Iſraelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be aſſaulted from divers parts at once; having the Philiſtims towards the Weſt and Sea-coaſt, the Canaanite toward the North and Eaſt, and the Idumite on the South. The eſtate being thus ſettled, Samuel for the eaſe of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turns, as hath been elſewhere ſaid.

* Plutarch reports of Numa the ſecond King of Rome, that when as he was ſacrificing, it was told him that the enemies approached, he nothing diſmaied, anſwered, Ego autem ſacrifico. 1 Sam. 2. 10.

CHAP. XVI.

Of SAUL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the Government into a Kingdom.

BUt when age now began to overtake Samuel, and that he was not able to undergo the burthen of ſo careful a government, he put off from himſelf the weight of the affairs on his ſons, Joel and Abijah, who judged the people at Beerſheba, a City, the very utmoſt towards the South of Judæa. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, ſo were themſelves no leſs removed from the juſtice and vertue of their Father: For the thirſt of coveteouſneſs, the more it ſwalloweth, the more it drieth, and deſireth, finding taſte in nothing but gain; to recover which, they ſet the Law at a price, and ſold Juſtice and Judgment to the beſt Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Iſraael obſerved, and ſaw that Samuel as a natural man (though a Prophet) could not ſo well diſcern the errours of his own, they prayed him to conſent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were;

who might also lead them to the War, and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yield fruit no less bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reverenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsel from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his own Sons; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, he used his best arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miseries which should befal them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath been born, and is so still, by free consent of the subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will use their sons in his own service to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grievous, but by the Vassals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best quality to command for the King in his Wars; and to till the ground no less proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought up: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dress meat, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned, He will take your Fields and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and give them to his servants; with other oppressions: this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirm that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a King governed by his own affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination construe this Text far otherwise, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Soveraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first upon that Deut. 1. place of Deuteronomy, where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Judges to Kings; and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings, as many wives, covetousnes, and the like, he commandeth that the Kings which were to raign over Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the dayes of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to do them: that he may prolong his dayes in his Kingdom, he and his Sons. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Laws of God, in the same book written. For it is said, That which is just and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayst live. Deut. 6. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but fordidden by God: it is much less lawful to take the vine- Deut. 23. yard it self from the owner, and give it to a- 24. nother. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as do warrant the Kings of Is- Loyse. rael, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vassals. For it is not said that it shall be lawful for the King, or the King may do this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sons: and again, This shall be the manner of the King that shall raign over you. God thereby fore-shewing what power, severed from piety (because it is accountable to God onely) will do in the future. And hereof we find the first example in Achab, who took from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with righte- Deut. 16. ous judgment. Wherefore, though the King had offered unto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because he was falsly accused, and unjustly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, even as David testifieth of himself: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata æquitas, non est æquitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Feigned innocence, and feigned equity, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquity and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who think this place to contain the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much less leſs here to inſert. Only thus much I will ſay, that if practice do ſhew the greatneſs of authority, even the beſt Kings of Juda and Iſrael were not ſo tyed by any laws, but that they did whatſoever they pleaſed in the greateſt things; and commanded ſome of their own Princes, and of their own brethren to be ſlain without any trial of law, being ſometime by Prophets reprehended, ſometime not. For though David confeſſed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Solomon killing his elder brother and others, the ſame was not imputed to him as any offence.

That the ſtate of Iſrael ſhould receive this change of government, it was not onely foretold by Moſes in Deuteronomie, but perceived by Jacob in this Scripture; The Scepter Gen. 49. ſhall not depart from Juda, &c. It was alſo Gen. 15. promiſed by God to Abraham for a bleſſing: Gen. 17. For it was not onely aſſured that his iſſues ſhould in number equal the ſtars in heaven, but that Kings ſhould proceed of him: Which ſtate ſeeing it is framed from the pattern of his ſole rule, who is Lord of the Univerſal; and the excellencie thereof in reſpect of all other governments, hath been by many judicious men handled and proved, I ſhall not need to over-paint that which is garniſhed with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every man hath obſerved what civil war Iſrael had: what outragious ſlaughters they committed upon each other: in what miſerable ſervitude they lived for many years: and when it fared beſt with them, they did but defend their own territories, or recover ſome parts thereof formerly loſt. The Canaanites dwelt in the beſt vallies of the Country. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan; the Philiſtims the Sea-coaſts; and the Jebuſites Hieruſalem it ſelf, till Davids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and eſtabliſh, but he maſtered and ſubjected all the neighbour Nations and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vaſſals. But whether it were for that the Iſraelites were moved by thoſe reaſons, which allure the moſt of all Nations to live under a Monarch, or whether by this means they ſought to be cleared 1 Sam. 8. from the ſons of Samuel, they became deaf to all the perſwaſions and threats which Samuel uſed, inſiſting upon this point, that they would have a King both to judge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to conſent, he ſent every man to his own City and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had diſmiſſed the aſſembly at Mizpah, he forbare the election of a King, till ſuch time as he was therein directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would preſent unto him a man of the Land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Sophim, to make a feaſt for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promiſes) and Saul alſo having wandred divers dayes to ſeek his fathers Aſſes, at length, by the advice of his ſervant, travelled towards Ramath to find a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his beaſts. In which journey it pleaſed God (who doth many times order the greateſt things by the ſimpleſt paſſages and perſons) to elect Saul, who ſought an Aſs and not a kingdom: like as formerly it had pleaſed him to call Moſes, while he fed the ſheep of Jethro; and after to make choice of David the youngeſt of eight ſons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beaſts; and changed his ſheephook into a Scepter, making him of all other the moſt victorious King of Juda and Iſrael. So John and James were taken from caſting their nets, to become fiſhers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apoſtles: a dignity that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours do; but permanent and everlaſting in Gods everlaſting Kingdom. 1 Sam. 16.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected, and ſtayed his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God ſhewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the ſame whom he had foretold him of, that he ſhould rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Iſrael, much leſs knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the City the Seer dwelt; Samuel anſwered, that himſelf was the man he ſought; and prayed Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel ſetting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affairs of the kingdom, and of Gods graces to be beſtowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Iſrael.

After this he told him all that ſhould happen him in the way homeward, that two men ſhould should encounter him by Rahels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the fear of losing his beasts, to doubt the loss of his son: that he should then meet three other men in the plain of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophecy with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spiritual gifts, were not of the first and most reverenced number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, reprehended without fear the errors of their Kings and wrought miracles, of which number were Moses, Josshua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahias, Elias, Elisæus, Esay, Jeremy, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, præterita, præsentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh 1 Cor. 14. 14. who inriched with spiritual gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

Chrys in Ps. 43.

At Mizpeth Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had past between him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveal it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeth, the general opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinks by the answer of * Urim and Thummim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mistery upon his breast when he asked the counsel of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jews, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jews also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanius, and others, have remembred divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called Divisory; the Third, Divinatory, and unto one of these three all may be reduced, all which kinds, howsoever they may seem chanceful, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And

* The Urim and Thummim in the ornaments of the High Priest, were inserted within the pectoral, which therefore was duplicatum: they were placed in the pectoral over against the heart of the High Priest. It is plain that they were not the precious stones, nor any thing made by the Artificers. See Exo. 38. 1. Cic. de divir. Paus. in Mes. 1 Sam. 10.

in like sort fell the Kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himself in modesty, as both Josephus construe it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himself the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that envied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was, of whom Saul, to avoyd sedition, took no notice.

§. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victory.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdom, but that he received knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Jabes Gilead: which nation since the great overthrow given them by Jephta, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did always attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorite, and then Israel dispossest them of; which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephta's time, yet they never perswaded themselves of more advantage then at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembred that the Philistims had not long before slain 34000. of their men of War: and besides had used great care and policy that they should have no Smiths to make them swords or spears: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemesites, and places adjoyning, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000. and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to inlarge their Dominions upon their borderers: Jabes Gilead being one of the neareſt. Besides it may further be conjectured, that the Ammonites were imboldened against Jabes Gilead, in respect of their weakness: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not joyning with them against the Benjamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the Jud. 12.

men and male children, but took from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increaſed to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themſelves of this great calamity, yet the Ammonite might flatter himſelf with the opinion, that Iſrael, having for long time been diſarmed by the Philiſtims, was not apt to ſuccour thoſe whom they had ſo deeply wounded and deſtroyed. But contrariwiſe, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ranſome themſelves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they ſhould be utterly diſabled for the War, as elſewhere hath been ſpoken: Saul, both to value himſelf in his firſt years reign, and becauſe perchance he was deſcended of one of thoſe 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to aſſemble the forces of Iſrael, hewing a yoak of Oxen into pieces, and ſending them by meſſengers over all the coaſts, proteſting thus: That whoſoever came not forth after Saul, and after Samuel; ſo ſhould his Oxen be ſerved: threatning the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the firſt. Seven days had Saul to aſſemble an Armie, by reaſon that the Gileadites had obtained the reſpite of theſe ſeven days to give Nahas the Ammonite an anſwer: who, could they have obtained any reaſonable condition, were contented to have ſevered themſelves from Iſrael, and to become Vaſſals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the mean while Saul aſſembled the forces which repaired unto him at Bezec, near Jordan, that he might readily paſs the river; which done, he might in one day with a ſpeedy march arrive at Jabes, under the Hills of Gilead. 1 Sam 11. 8.

The army by Saul led, conſiſting of three hundred and thirty thouſand, he returned an anſwer to thoſe of Jabes, that they ſhould aſſure themſelves of ſuccour by the next day at noon. For, as it ſeemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, & went on all night; for in the morning watch he ſurprized the army of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might ſet on them on all ſides, he divided his forces into three parts, putting them to the ſword untill the heat of the day, and the wearineſs of Sauls troop inforced them to give over the purſuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careleſs and ſecure, in that thoſe of Jabes promiſed the next morning to render themſelves and their City to their mercy. After this happy ſucceſs, the people were ſo far in love with their new King, that they would have ſlain all thoſe Iſraelites that murmured againſt his election, had not himſelf forbidden and reſiſted their reſolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the proſperous, and baſe Vaſſals of the time that flouriſheth; and as deſpightful and cruel without cauſe againſt thoſe, whom any miſadventure, or other worldly accident hath thrown down.

After the Army removed, Samuel ſummoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and, as ſome Commenters affirm, anointed King: and here Samuel uſed an exhortation to all the aſſembly, containing precepts, and a rehearſal of his own Juſtice, during the beginning of his government to that day, after Saul had now reigned one year before he was eſtabliſhed in Gilgal, or Galgala, he ſtrengthned himſelf with a good guard of 3000. choſen men, of which he aſſigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his ſon at Gibeah, the City of his nativity: the reſt he kept about his own perſon in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel. 1 Sam. 11. 1 Sam. 13.

§. IV.

Of Sauls diſobedience in his proceedings in the Wars with the Philiſtims and Amalekites, which cauſed his final rejection.

JOnathan with his ſmall Army or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, ſurprized a Garriſon of Philiſtims: the ſame, as ſome think, which Saul paſt by, when he came from Rama, when he was firſt anointed by Samuel, which they think to have been Cariath-jearim: becauſe a place where the Philiſtims had a Garriſon. 1 Sam. 10. is called the hill of God, which they underſtand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius underſtands this Garriſon to have been at Gebah in Benjamin near Gibha, where Jonathan abode with his thouſand followers. Howſoever, by this it appeareth that the Philiſtims held ſome ſtrong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territory of Iſrael: and now being greatly inraged by this ſurprize, they aſſembled thirty thouſand armed Chariots, and ſix thouſand Horſe, wherewith they invaded Judæa, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a City of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hieruſalem, and in the middeſt of the Land between the Sea and Jordan. With this ſudden invaſion the Iſraelites were ſtrucken in ſo great a fear, as ſome of them hid themſelves in the caves of the Mountains; others fled over Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himſelf with ſome 2000. men of ordinary, and many other people, 1 Sam. 13. 5.

ple, ſtaid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the paſſage of Joſhua when he led Iſrael over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel ſeven days: but when the laſt day was in part ſpent, and that Saul percieved his forces to diminiſh greatly, he preſumed (as ſome expound the place, 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to exerciſe the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt offering, and a peace offering unto God, contrary to the Eccleſiaſtical Laws of the Hebrews, and Gods Commandments: others expound the word obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and ſo make the ſin of Saul not to have been any intruſion into the Prieſts office, but firſt a diſobedience to Gods Commandment, in not ſtaying according to the appointment, 1 Sam. 10. 8. ſecondly, a deffidence or miſtruſt in Gods help, and too great relying upon the ſtrength of the people, whoſe departing from him he could not bear patiently; and laſtly, a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of ſo godly a man might procure him. But whatſoever was his ſin, notwithſtanding his excuſes, he was by Samuel reprehended moſt ſharply, in terms unfitting his eſtate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel ſo to do, from God himſelf; at which time alſo Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdom ſhould be conferred to another (a man after Gods own heart) both from Saul and his poſterity.

1 Sam. 13. Verſ. 14.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his army, found it to conſiſt of 600. men: for the moſt were fled from him and ſcattered, yea and among thoſe that ſtaid, there was not any that had either ſword or ſpear, but Saul and his ſon Jonathan onely. For the Philiſtims had not left them any Smith in all Iſrael, that made weapons; beſides, they that came to Saul, came haſtily, and left ſuch weapons and armour as they had behind them in their garriſons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul ſhould be able the year before, or in ſome part of this very year, to ſuccour Jabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thouſand men, if there had not now been any iron weapon to defend themſelves withall, ſave onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his ſon. But howſoever, all the reſt of the people were formerly diſarmed by the Philiſtims, and all thoſe crafts-men carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Iſraelites onely files to ſharpen & amend ſuch ſtuff as ſerved for the Plough, and for nought elſe: yet that they had

1 Sam. 13. 19.

ſome kind of arms, it is manifeſt, or elſe they durſt not have attempted upon the Philiſtims as they did. And it is not ſaid in the Text that there was not any ſword in all Iſrael, but onely that there was not any found amongſt thoſe 600. ſouldiers which ſtayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it ſeemeth that when Samuel had ſharply reprehended Saul, that his own guards forſook him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinary ſouldiers, and of all the reſt that repaired unto him, of which many were fled from him before Samuel arrived.

1 Sam. 13. 21.

With this ſmall troop he held himſelf to his own City of Gibeah, as a place of more ſtrength, and better aſſured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obſcure how it ſhould come to paſs that the Philiſtims ſhould thus diſarm the moſt part of the Iſraelites, howſoever in the time of Samuel much had been done againſt them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by ſword or ſpear, but by thunder from Heaven: and when theſe craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Iſrael, no marvel if they could not in a ſhort peace under Samuel be replanted again. For this tyranny of the Philiſtims is to be underſtood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not ſuffering their Artificers to teach the Iſraelites, and ſo even to the times of Saul kept them from having any ſtore of armour. The ſame policy did Nebuchodonoſor uſe after his Conqueſt in Judæa: Dioniſius in Sicily, & many other Princes elſe-where in all ages. But theſe loſt weapons in part the Iſraelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philiſtims had not invaded. The reſt of their defences were ſuch as antiquity uſed, and their preſent neceſſity miniſtred unto them, to wit, clubs, bows, and ſlings. For the Benjamites exceeded in caſting ſtones in ſlings: and that theſe were the natural weapons, and the firſt of all nations, it is manifeſt; and ſo in the firſt of Chronicles the 12. Chapter, it is written of thoſe that came to ſuccour David againſt Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could uſe the right and the left hand with ſtones, and with a ſling it was that David himſelf ſlew the Gyant Goliah.

While the State of Iſrael ſtood in theſe hard terms, the Philiſtims having parted their army into three troops, that they might ſpoil and deſtroy many parts at once, Jonathan, ſtrengthened by God, and followed with his Eſquire only, ſcaled a mountain, whereon a company of Philiſtims were lodged: the reſt of their army (as may be gathered by the

the ſucceſs) being encamped in the plain adjoyning. And though he were diſcovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kind of deriſion, called up by his enemies: yet he ſo behaved himſelf, as with the aſſiſtance of God he ſlew 20. of the firſt Philiſtims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cauſe, fled away amazed altogether. In which confuſion, fear, and jealouſie, they ſlaughtered one another inſtead of enemies: whereupon thoſe Hebrews which became of their party, becauſe they feared to be ſpoiled by them, took the advantage of their deſtruction, and ſlew of them in great numbers. And laſtly, Saul himſelf taking knowledge of the rout and diſorder, together with thoſe Iſraelites that ſhrouded themſelves in Mount Ephraim, ſet upon them, and 1 Sam. 14 obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a moſt happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that propheſie in Deuteronomy fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of thoſe which feared God, ſhould kill a thouſand, and two of them ten thouſand.

This done, the ſmall Army of Iſrael made retreat from the purſuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the evening, yet his ſon Jonathan, being infeebled with extream labour and emptineſs, taſted a drop of honey in his paſſage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his cruelty.

The late miraculous victory of Saul and Jonathan, ſeems to have reduced unto the Philiſtims remembrance their former overthrow, likewiſe miraculous in the daies of Samuel; ſo that for ſome ſpace of time they held themſelves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, under-
1 Sam. 14. took by turns all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, againſt all which he prevailed. He then aſſembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiving the commandement of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, waſting and deſtroying all that part of Arabia Petræa, and the Deſart belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which war he took Agag their King priſoner. But whereas he was inſtructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compaſſion, becauſe they firſt of all attempted Iſrael, when they left Ægypt in Exod. 17. Moſes time: he notwithſtanding did not only ſpare the life of Agag, but reſerved the beſt of the beaſts, and ſpoil of the Country, with pretence to offer them in ſacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a ſecond time make him know that God would caſt him from his royal eſtate, to which he was raiſed when he was of baſe condition, and, as the Text hath it, little in his own eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there been no former precept to that effect: yet ſeeing Saul could not be ignorant how ſeverely it pleaſed God to enjoyn the Iſraelites to revenge themſelves upon that Nation, he was in all unexcuſable. For Deut. 25. 15. God had commanded that the Iſraelites ſhould put out the remembrance of Amalec from under heaven. For the cruelty which the predeceſſors of this Agag uſed againſt the Iſraelites, eſpecially on thoſe which were overwearied, faint, ſick, and aged people, was now to be revenged on him, and his Nation, above 400. years afterward; and now he was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himſelf having alſo ſinned in the ſame kind, as theſe words of Samuel witneſs: As thy ſword hath made other women childleſs, ſo ſhall thy mother be childleſs among other women; at which time
1 Sam. 15. 33. Samuel himſelf (after he had been by many bootleſs intreaties perſwaded to ſtay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and ſoon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to ſee Saul until the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the occurrents between the rejection of Saul and his death.

NOw while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to chooſe a King for Iſrael, among the ſons of Iſhai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a ſort to perform, till it pleaſed God to direct him, how he might avoid both the ſuſpition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wiſdom he ſought to avoid the inconveniences or dangers of this life: then do theſe men miſtake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reaſon that God hath given them, do no otherwiſe avoid the perils and dangers thereof, than as men ſtupified in the opinion of fate or deſtiny, neglecting either to beg counſel at Gods hands by prayer, or to exerciſe that wiſdom or foreſight, wherewith God hath enriched the mind of man for his preſervation. Neither did the all-powerful God (who made and could deſtroy the world in an inſtant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sons of Ishai, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of David, the youngest, having refused Eliab, the first born: who though he were a man of a comely person & great strength; yet unto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it
1 Sam. 10. is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other six brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock; for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seek the life of David: in which bloody mind he continued till he died, overcome in battel by the Philistims.

The Philistims having well considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still and forborn to give impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new trial of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs, which they had done to Israel, might be repaied with advantage, if ever opportunity should serve their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the quality of their Souldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselves equal, if not superiour to Israel. The success of their former wars had, for the most part, been agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes; as to a tempest hapning by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Army, possessed with a needless fear, had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neer to the Army, which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a battel, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joyning in gross, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to pass the Valley that lay between their Camps. Just causes of fear they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had been confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroak from heaven were to be feared. Goliah of Gath, a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, undertook to defie the whole Hoste of Israel, provoking them with despightful words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the party vanquished in Champion, should hold it self as overcome in gross, and become vassal unto the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publique notice of the people. For no man durst expose himself to encounter the great strength of Goliah, until David (sent by his father of an errand to the Camp) accepted the combat, and obtained the victory, without other arms, offensive or defensive, than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Giant, and after with his own Sword strook off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yielded themselves as subjects to the Conquerour, according to the covenant on their own side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered even to their own gates. By this victory the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their Towns were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victory, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul, and came upon David, he then became a cruel Tyrant, 1 Sam. 16. 13.
faithless, and irreligious. Because the High Priest Abimelech fed David in his necessity with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his own conquest, taken from Goliah; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the City, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and 1 Sam. 22. 18.
woman, both child and suckling, both Ox and Ass, and Sheep. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattel, contrary to the Commandement and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercy in store for the innocent, for the Lords servants, the Priests of Israel. Yea, he would have slain his own 1 Sam. 14. 23.
son Jonathan, for pitying and pleading Davids innocency; as also once before for tasting the honey, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers unreasonable commination. The companions of cruelty are breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised promiſed him; and again in taking her away from him to whom he had given her: alſo in that when as David had twice ſpared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice ſworn to do him no hurt, and confeſſed his errours, yet he ſought ſtill to deſtroy him, by all the means he could. His impiety towards God he ſhewed, in that he ſought counſel of the Witch of Endor, which was the laſt preparative for his deſtruction. For whereas when he ſought counſel from God, he had been alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Devil this ſucceſs followed, that both himſelf, and his three ſons, with his neareſt and faithful ſervants, were all ſlaughtered by the Philiſtims: his body with the bodies of his ſons (as a ſpectacle of ſhame and diſhonour) were hung over the walls of Bethſan; and there had remained till they had found burial in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the grateful Gileadites of Jabes ſtoln their carcaſſes thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Iſrael, together with Samuel, 40. years, and by himſelf after Samuel 20. years, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Joſephus. But yet it ſeemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written, that Samuel died; and in the reſt of the ſame chapter, the paſſages are written of David, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly enſued.

Act. 13. 21. Cedren. pa. 69. Theoph. l. 3. p. 1. Joſeph. l. 28.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a fair entrance to all thoſe victories which David afterward obtained: for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; cruſht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the ſtrength of the Amalekites; and greatly waſted the power and pride of the Philiſtims.

§. VI.

Of ſuch as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen, and Hercules, and of their iſſues: upon occaſion of the Dores, with the Heraclidæ, entring Peloponneſus about this time.

IN the ſecond year of Samuel, according to Euſebius, was David born: after Codoman, later, and in the ninth year: after Bunting, in the tenth. For David, ſaith he, was thirty years old when he began to reign: whence it followeth, that he was born in the tenth of the forty years, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh year of Samuel, Æneas Silvius the ſon of Poſthumus began his reign over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State one and thirty years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Poſthumus, calling him the fifth from Æneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not ſtand to diſpute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilas ſate in the Throne of Aſſyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire forty years. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponneſus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the Nation, poſſeſt a great part thereof, 328. years before the firſt Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratoſthenes. For all Greece was anciently poſſeſſed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen the ſon of Deucalion, Lord of the Country of Pthiotis in Theſſaly. But before the time of this Hellen, yea, and long after, Greece had no name common to all the Inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till ſuch time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the Plantation of many Colonies, and ſundry great victories obtained, the iſſues of Hellen had reduced much of the Country under their obedience, calling themſelves generally by one name, and yet every ſeveral Nation after ſome one of the poſterity of Hellen, who had raigned over it. And becauſe this is the fartheſt antiquity of Greece, it will not be amiſs to recount the Pedegree of her firſt planters.

Japetus (as the Poets fable) was the ſon of Heaven and Earth, ſo accounted, either becauſe the names of his Parents had in the Greek tongue ſuch ſignification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Aſtronomy & Philoſophy. Japetus begat Prometheus, and Ephimetheus: of whom all men have read that have read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion; and Epimetheus, Pyrrha; Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha reigned in Theſſaly, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretenſis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queen. In Deucalions time was that great floud, of which we have ſpoken elſewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whoſe ſons were Xuthus, Dorus, and Æolus: of Dorus and Æolus the Dores and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Dores having firſt inhabited ſundry parts of Theſſaly, did afterward ſeat themſelves about Parnaſſus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldeſt ſon of Hellen, being baniſhed by his brethren, for having diverted from them to his own uſe ſome part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, he begat on her two ſons, Achæus and Ion. Of theſe two, Achæus, for a ſlaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponneſus:

ponneſus: and ſeating himſelf in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence (as ſome write) he afterwards departed; and levying an Army, recovered the Kingdom of his Grand-father in Theſſalie.

Ion being General for the Athenians when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtain a great Victory, and thereby ſuch love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing every one to ſome occupation, or good courſe of life. When the people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos or Ægialia: In which Country Solinus then reigning, thought it ſafer to give his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heir, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Town called by his Wives name in Ægialia, where he and his poſterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land denomination. But in after times the Dores aſſiſting the Nephews of Hercules, invaded Peloponneſus, and overcomming the Achæans, poſſeſſed Laconia, and all thoſe parts which the Achæi, had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driven to ſeek a new ſeat, came unto the Ionес, deſiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alleged in vain, that Ion and Achæus had been brethren. When this requeſt could not be obtained, they ſought by force to expel the Ionians, which they performed; but they loſt their King Tiſamenes, the ſon of Oreſtes, in that War.

Thus were the Ionес driven out of Peloponneſus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they ſailed into Aſia, and peopled the Weſtern coaſt thereof; on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the leaſt without any univerſal or memorable tranſmigration. This expedition of the Ionес into Aſia hath been mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. years after the War of Troy, and 60. years after the deſcent of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus. Theſe Heraclidæ were they of whom the Kings of Sparta iſſued; which race held that Kingdom about 700. years. Of their Father Hercules many ſtrange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which ſome are like to have been true, others perhaps muſt be allegorically underſtood. But the moſt approved Writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whoſe exploits were by the Greeks aſcribed to the ſon of Alcmena, who is ſaid to have performed theſe 12. great labours.

Firſt he ſlew the Nemæan Lyon: ſecondly, he ſlew the ſerpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very ſwift Hart: the fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadia: the fifth was the cleanſing of Augias his Oxe-ſtall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: the ſixt was the chaſing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis the ſeventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: the eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane fleſh: the ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: the three laſt were, to fetch Gerion's Beeves from Gades; the golden Apples of the Heſperides; and Cerberus from Hell. The Mythological interpretation of theſe I purpoſely omit, as both over-long to be here ſet down, and no leſs perplexed than the labours themſelves. For ſome by Hercules underſtand Fortitude, Prudence, and Conſtancy, interpreting the Monſters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sun, and his travels to be the twelve ſignes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his Works hiſtorically to their own conceits; as well aſſured, that the expoſition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables. That he took Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other Towns, being aſſiſted by ſuch as either admired his vertues, or were beholding unto him; Alſo that he ſlew many Theeves and Tyrants, I take to be truely written, without addition of Poetical vanity. His travels through moſt part of the World, are, or may ſeem, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But ſure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his endeavours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppreſſion. But after his death, no City of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deſerts of Hercules, with conſtant protection of his Children, perſecuted by the King Euryſtheus. This Euryſtheus was Son of Sthenelus, and grand-child of Perſeus; he reigned in Mycenæ, the mightieſt City then in Greece. He it was that impoſed thoſe hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madneſs he had committed upon his own children; but as others ſay, becauſe he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Euryſtheus for employing the ſtrength of Hercules to ſo good a purpoſe. But it is ſo generally agreed by the beſt Writers, that Hercules was alſo of the the ſtock of Perſeus, and holden in great jealouſie by Euryſtheus becauſe of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous ſervices, wherein he was imployed, ſo that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many Wives and Concubines above threeſcore Children. Theſe Children Euryſtheus would fain have got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Ceyx King of Thracinia, and from him (for he durſt not withſtand Euryſtheus) to Athens. The Athenians not only gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountred Euryſteus. Idolaus the brothers ſon of Hercules, who had aſſiſted him in many of his travels, was Captain of the Heraclidæ. It is ſaid of him, that being dead he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Euryſtheus: whom when he had ſlain in battel, he died again. It ſeems to me, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to aſſiſt his Couſins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponneſians underſtood that Euryſtheus was ſlain, they took Atreus the Son of Pelops to their King: for he was rich, mighty, and favoured of the People. Againſt him the Heraclidæ marched under Hyllus, the ſon of Hercules. But to avoid effuſion of bloud, it was agreed, that Hyllus ſhould fight with Echenus King of the Tegeatæ, a people of Arcadia, who aſſiſted Atreus; with condition, that if Hyllus were Victor, he ſhould peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwiſe the Heraclidæ ſhould not enter Peloponneſus in an hundred years. In that combat Hyllus was ſlain, and the Heraclidæ compelled to forbear their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Ariſtodemus (as the beſt authority doth ſhew, though ſome have ſaid, that they came under the conduct of his Children) and brought with them the Dores whom they planted in that Country, as is before ſhewed, having expelled the Achæi, over whom the iſſue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Euryſtheus four generations.

§. VII.

Of Homer and Heſiod, and many changes in the World, that happened about this Age.

ABout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the beſt Chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Mæones, deſcended (as Functius imagineth) of Beroſus his Anamæon, who gave name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to have been long after theſe times, raſhly framing his Æra according to (a) Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes ſeven more of this name to have flouriſhed in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, ſprang the diverſity of opinions, both of the time, and of the native City of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manaſſe King of Juda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Meleſigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, becauſe blind men follow a guide, which ſignification among others, is in the Verb ὁμαρτεῖν: for this Homer in his later time was blind. * Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the queſtion of the time when Homer lived. So alſo (b) Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Aſſyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flouriſhed 950. years before the Conſulſhip of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator caſteth up in the Worlds year 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. years: and about 250. years before the building of Rome; making him to have flouriſhed about the time of Jehoſaphat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus & Tatianus above named, mention Authors that make him much antienter. The difference of which Authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers conſideration, that by this one inſtance he may gheſſe of the difficulty, and ſo pardon the errours in the computations of ancient time: ſeeing in ſuch diverſity of opinions a man may hardly find out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80. years after Troy taken, near the time that the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponneſus: and * Eratoſtenes after Troy 100. years. Theopompus 500. years after the Army of Greece ſailed into Phrygia for the War of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporary with Gyges, who began to reign in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. years after Rome was built) and Soſibius ſaith, that he was 90. years before the firſt Olympiad: which he ſeeks to prove by the times of Charillus and his ſon Nicander. Philechorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Ariſtarchus 140. in the time of the ſeating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Ageſilaus governed Lacedæmon; and that Lycurgus in his young years, about 100. years after the Ionian plantations, came to viſit him, near 240. years after Troy taken. Herodotus finds Homer flouriſhing 622. years before Xerxes enterpriſe terprise against the Grecians: which Berosaldus accounteth at 168. years after the Trojan War. Eusebius seems to make him to have been about the time of Joas King of Juda, 124. years before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronology he notes that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other Ages. In his Evangelical Preparation, where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek Writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristæus, Orpheus, Musæus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Noct. Attic. l. 3. c. 11. Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertain which of these learned Fablers was first born: but he finds that they lived together some certain years, wherein he confirms himself by an Epigram, written upon a Trevit, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Var. de imag. l. 1. Nep. in chron. Cass. l. 1. annal.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. years before Rome built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about (a) 140. years after the fall of Troy. (b) Euthymenes finds them both 200. years after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the son of Pelias, King of Thessaly. For my self, I am not much troubled when this Poet lived; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty, and disagreement of Historians, aswel in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For, the curiosity of this mans age is no less ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mystery. In derision whereof Lucian feigning himself to have been in Hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his book with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to do.

(a) This number Mercator corrects and reads 240. for it.

It seemeth that Senyes, or, after Macrobius, Senemires ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanepherfobris was his Successour, who preceded Vaphres, Father in law to Solomon.

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Davids time, according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that Famous State of Troy (which fell 103. years before David's time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the World, not only by reason of those Northern Nations: but there sprung up somewhat nearly together, six Kingdoms into greatness, not before erected. In Italy that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achæi. In Arabia, Syria, Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites having now altered the Form of Government, began to flourish under Kings, of which David, in a few years, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by enterchange of times had subjected the Judæans, corrupted their Religion, and held them under in a most abject and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edumæans, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Ituræans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Jebusites, Geshurites, Macathites; all which acknowledged David for their Soveraign Lord, and paid him tribute.

Of DAVID.

§. I.
Of Davids estate in the time of Saul.

THE hazzards which David ran into while he was yet only designed King, and lived as a private man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The first personal act of Fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both Armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the son of Saul, that he loved him as his own soul: Insomuch as when Saul sought to perswade his son that David would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause; Jonathan could never be perswaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of David's life, and well doing. It was not long after this signal act of David, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though he were become as his houshold servant, and his Esquire, or Armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evil spirit, was advised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him upon the Harp; whereby it was thought that he might find ease; which came to pass accordingly. He entertained David for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of command among the men of War. But the jealous Tyrant soon waxed weary of his good affection, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moved only through envy of his Vertue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a spear at David that was then playing on his Harp to do him ease.

Cens. c.12. & 14. Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzy, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmony, Seneca, in his third book of Anger witnesseth. But the madness of Saul came from the cause of causes: and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yielded unto that Musick, which God had ordained to be a mean of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul having failed in such open attempts, gave unto David the command over 1000. Souldiers to confront the Philistims withall. For he durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, he promised him his Daughter Merab to Wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to David his younger Daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philistims would take David's head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now David's Victories begat new fears and jealousies in Saul, he practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murther him in his own house, but Michol his Wife delivered him. So David sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himself, he was forc'd to counterfeit both simplicity and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims, he covered himself in the Cave of Adullam: and after conveying such of his Kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himself in the deserts of Ziph, Maon, and the Hils of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desart of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred with which his Master Saul was known to prosecute him.

Jansen. in Psal.

Of Achis David obtained Siglag* in Simeon, pretending to invade Judæa: but he bent his forces another way, and strook the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none live to complain upon him. Achis supposing that David had drawn bloud of his own Nation, thought himself assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoneth David to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himself to Siglag. At his return he found the Town burnt, his two Wives, with the Wives and Children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers mutined, but God gave him comfort, and assurance to recover all again: which he did.

* It seemeth that Simeon never obtained Siglag till this time, for it is said in the 1 of Sam. c. 27. v. 6. therefore Siglag pertaineth unto the King of Juda unto this day.

This Army of the Philistims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three sons were slain. The newes, with Saul's Crown and Bracelets, were brought to David at Siglag, in his return from being victorious over Amaleck, by a man of the same Nation, who avowed (though falsly) that himself at Saul's request had slain him. David, because he had accused himself, made no scruple to cause him to be slain at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence withal. Otherwise it followeth not that every man ought to be believed of himself to his own prejudice. For it is held in the law; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unless some other proof inform the conscience of the Judge. For a man may confess those things of himself, that the Judge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi confeſſus, & in cap. de pœnis l. qui ſententiam, therefore doth the Gloſs reconcile theſe two places in this ſort: Si quis in judicio ſponte de ſeipſo confiteatur, & poſteà maneat in confeſſione, id eſt ſatis. If any man in judgement do confeſs of himſelf, of his own accord, and after doth perſevere in his confeſſion, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable; for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befel him being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtir up ſorrow, and move compaſſion in the heart of David.

The victory which the Philiſtims had gotten, was ſo great, that ſome Towns of the Iſraelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and left unto the enemy, who took poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeem ſtrange, that a Nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiſtims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the Conqueſt entire. Moſt like it ſeems, that the civil war immediately breaking out between David and the houſe of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the reſt of Iſreal, gave them hope of an eaſie victory over both; and thereby cauſed them to attempt nothing at the preſent, leſt by ſo doing they ſhould enforce their diſegreeing enemies to a neceſſary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part ſhould conſume the other, by which means both the victors, and the vanquiſhed, would become a prey to the violence of ſuch as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Davids reign, and the war made by Abner for Isboſeth.

AFter the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the War, ſought to advance Isboſeth (or Jeboſtus, according to Joſephus) though he had no right to the Kingdom of Iſrael: for Mephiboſeth the firſt ſon of Jonathan lived. Againſt this Abner and Isboſeth, David made a defenſive war, till Abner paſt Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time he ſent Joab with ſuch forces as he had, to reſiſt Abner: Isboſeth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountred each other near Gibeon, where it ſeemeth that Abner made the offer to try the quarrel by the hands of a few; like to that combate between the Lacedæmonians and the Argives, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being choſen of each Nation, of which number three perſons were only left unſlain. The like tryal by a far leſs number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii, for the Romans and Latines. The ſame challenge Goliah the Philiſtim made, whom David ſlew: a cuſtom very antient. Edward the third offered the like tryal in his own perſon to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve choſen of each part, in this war of David with the houſe of Saul, to wit, ſo many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whoſe force and valour was ſo equal, as there ſurvived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrel ſtaid not here, for the Army of Juda preſt Abner in groſs, and brake him. Three hundred and ſixty men of Abners companions were ſlain, and but twenty of Juda; whereof Aſahel the brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs purſue Abner, and by Abners perſwaſions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounded him to death with the ſtroak of his ſpear. For though Aſahel 2. Sam. 2. were an excellent foot-man, and, as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as Joſephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horſes; and hoped to have gotten great fame if he could have maſtered Abner (who, as Aſahel perſwaded himſelf, had by being overthrown, and flying away, loſt his courage) yet here it fell out Eccleſ. 9. true, That the race is not to the ſwift.

That this civil war laſted two years, we Verſe 10. find it written in the ſecond of Samuel, the ſecond Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter reſteth ſtill in diſpute, and ſome of the Rabbines conceive that Isboſeth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the War as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Isboſeth after this, and till ſuch time as there grew jealouſie between him and Isboſeth for Sauls Concubine: neither did the death of Isboſeth inſtantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the ſame doth not certainly appear.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner ſlain by Joab, and of Isboſeth by Rechab and Baanah.

ABner, reconciled to David, was anon 2 Sam. 3. 27. by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in Davids Favour, and in the commandment of his forces; by which which he was grown ſo powerfull, as David forbare to call him to account: for thus much he confeſſeth of himſelf; I am this day weak, and theſe men, the Sons of Zer-

2 Sam. 3. 39. viah, be too hard for me. In this ſort David complained after Abners death; and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publike imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of
Verſ. 29. Joab, and on all his fathers houſe: and let them be ſubject to ulcers, to the leproſie, to lameneſs, to the ſword, and to poverty, &c. For could any thing have withſtood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Joab might greatly have indangered Davids eſtate, Abner being the mouth and truſt of all the reſt of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This miſchance therefore David openly bewailed, ſo that all Iſrael perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being general of the men of war, was of ſuch importance, that the Kings themſelves were fain to give them great reſpect, as hath been already ſhewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Juda, and thought himſelf worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole Kingdom. For he was near to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adverſity; wherefore he did not think it meet, that an old enemy ſhould in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature ſo jealous of his dignity and place, that he afterward ſlew Amaſa his own kinſman, and the Kings, upon the ſame quarrel, taking it in high diſdain to ſee him joyned with himſelf as captain of the hoſt of Juda; much leſs could he brook a ſuperiour; and ſuch a one as had ſlain his brother, and been beaten himſelf, in battel. But howſoever Joab did hate or deſpiſe Abner, David eſteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Iſrael, excuſing the overſight by which he might ſeem to have periſhed, by affirming that he dyed
2 Sam. 3. verſe 34. not like a fool, nor a man vanquiſhed, But as a man falleth before wicked men, ſo (ſaith he) dideſt thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him, whom a ſtronger hand deſtroyed unawares, or whom ſubtilty in free truſt bringeth to confuſion. For all under the Sun are ſubject to worldly miſeries and miſadventures. Howſoever Iſboſeth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he deſpaired greatly of his eſtate, and with him all Iſrael were poſſeſt with great fear: in ſo much as two of Iſboſeths own Captains, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Iſboſeth, and
2 Sam. 4. preſenting his head to David, received the ſame reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have ſlain Saul. Iſboſeth, being dead, all the Elders of Iſrael repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and laſt time anointed by general conſent.

§. IV.

Of the flouriſhing time of Davids Kingdom, the taking of Jeruſalem, with two overthrows given to the Philiſtims, and the conduction of the Ark to the City of David.

WHen David was now eſtabliſhed in the Kingdom, his firſt enterpriſe was upon the Jebuſites, who in deriſion of his force, and confident in the ſtrength of the place (as is thought) manned their walls with the blind and lame of their City; which David ſoon after entred, all their other forces notwithſtanding. For having maſtered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the City of David) he became 2 Sam. 5.
Lord of Hieruſalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebuſites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moſes and Joſhua, and after them almoſt 400. years. There are who expound this place, otherwiſe: Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou ſhalt not come in hither. For ſome think that it was meant by the Idols of the Jebuſites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Iſaac, and Jacob: the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by vvreſtling vvith the Angel, and that therefore till thoſe (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to moleſt them. But for my ſelf, I take it vvith Joſephus, that they armed their walls with certain impotent people at firſt, in ſcorn of Davids attempt. For they that had held their City about 400. years againſt all the children of Iſrael, Joſhua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it alſo againſt David.

When he had now poſſeſt himſelf of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatory Embaſſadours and preſents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines, and married moe wives, by whom he had ten ſons in Jeruſalem, and by his former wives, he had ſix in Hebron where he reigned 7. years.

The Philiſtims hearing that David was now anointed King, as well of Juda as of Iſrael, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his ſeat. And being encountred by David at two ſeveral times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they 2 Sam. 5. were at both times overthrown. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then David assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Ark of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibea to the City of David; which business was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the son of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Ark, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harm, when it was shaken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the City with sacrifices, musick, dances, and all signs of joyfulness, in which David himself gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Ark, and afterward told him in scorn, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eys of the maidens his servants, namely, that he forgat his regal dignity both, in apparel and behaviour, and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools do in the ways and streets: not that she disliked Davids behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but rather the aboundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembring the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the son of Ishai had built this his greatness: together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despiteful tearms, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chr. c 3. This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God, but was forbidden it, because he was a man of vvar, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatned, not in vain, that he would require the blood of a man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars which David had made vvere just, and the bloud therein shed vvas of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it vvas not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy temple, hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who think by bloud-shed & terror of their wars, to make themselves in greatness like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodness, or seek the blessedness promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now although it vvas not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Davids founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting Throne that should be established in his seed.

§. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

SOon after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerless, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in hast. For it is written, Accepit frænum Amgaris è manu Philisthæorum; 2 Sam. 8. v. 1. which place our English Geneva converts in these words, And David took the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latin of Junius giveth another and a better sence; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong City of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneva hath it in the marginal note. This City of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cæsarea, set on the frontier of Palæstina, at the entrance into Judæa and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retreat in all their invasions, which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier town of equal strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Ammæ, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his first book, and chap. 13. This exposition is made plain, and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18. Junius in c. 8. of the 2. of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Jews that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kind, but inforc'd them to come down into their territory, for all iron work whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David, were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims. 1 Sam. 13.

After this he gave them four other overthrows: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose spear weighed 300. shekles of brass which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David, and slew the Philistim, vvhereupon the Counsellours and Captains of David (lest the light of Israel might by his loss be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazzard himself in any battell. The second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neer Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversity he sought succour, and left his parents with him 2 Sam. 21. v. 17.

in truſt. But whether it were the ſame King or no, it is not known.

The Rabbines feign that Moab ſlew thoſe kinsfolks of David, which lived under his protection in Sauls time; but queſtionleſs David well knew how that Nation had been alwaies enemies to Iſrael, and took all the occaſions to vex them that were offered. And he alſo remembred that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Iſrael, not to ſeek the peace or proſperity of the Moabites; which David well obſerved, for he deſtroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his Army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Hadadezer the ſon of Rehob King thereof. The place is ſet down in the deſcription of the holy Land: to which I refer the Reader.

§. VI.

The war which David made upon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: David ſmote alſo Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Tohu oppreſt by Hadadezer, overthrew the one, and ſuccoured the other. But the ancient and moſt received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any ſuch enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in far better caſe to have proceeded after his victory than before: ſeeing that (Hadadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back, either to purſue him, to take victuals and ſupplies from him, or to the paſſages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, ſeeing David was either to paſs through a part of Arabia the deſart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his Army conſiſting of footmen, for the moſt, if not all: He had now both Horſe and Chariots good ſtore to carry his proviſions through thoſe uncultived places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates, or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jeruſalem, after he had twice overthrown the Syrian Army, not bending his courſe towards the river Euphrates, but ſeeking to eſtabliſh his purchaſes already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is ſaid.

The King of Syria, Damaſcena, and of Damaſcus, whereof that region is ſo called, hearing that Hadadezer was overthrown by the Iſraelites, fearing his own eſtate, and the loſs of his own countrey which adjoyned to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, ſent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his ſuccour: but theſe, as it appeareth, came too late for Hadadezer, and too ſoon for themſelves: for there periſhed of thoſe ſupplies 22000. This King of Damaſcus, Joſephus (out of Nicholaus an antient Hiſtorian) calleth Adad, who was alſo of the ſame name and family as alſo thoſe other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatneſs, and ſo continued for ten deſcents, till they were extinguiſhed by the Aſſyrians, as is ſhewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damaſcus under his obedience, left a garriſon therein, as he did in Edom: having alſo ſackt the adjoyning Cities of Betah, and Berathi, belonging to Hadadezer, of which Cities Ptolomy calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena, Tohu or Thoi, whoſe country of Hamath joyned to Adadezer (as in the deſcription of the holy Land the Reader may perceive) ſent his ſon Joram to congratulate this ſucceſs of David: partly becauſe he had war with Hadadezer, & partly becauſe he feared David now victorious. He alſo preſented David with veſſels of gold, ſilver, and braſs; all which, together with the golden ſhields of the Aramites, and the beſt of all the ſpoiles of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his return. Junius tranſlated the words (Clypeos aureos) by Umbones, as if all the parts of the Targets were not of gold, but the boſſes only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But becauſe Roboam made ſhields of braſs in place of theſe of Hadadezer, at ſuch time as Shicah the Egyptian ſack'd the Temple of Jeruſalem, it may be gathered thereby that thoſe of Hadadezer were golden ſhields. 2 Sam. 8.

This done, David ſent Embaſſadours to Hanum King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his eſtabliſhment in his fathers Kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nahaſh, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill adviſed, and over jealous of his eſtate, uſed Davids Meſſengers ſo barbarouſly, and contemptuouſly (by curtailing their beards, and their garments) as he thereby drew a War upon himſelf, which neither his own ſtrength, nor all the ayds purchaſed, could put off or ſuſtain. For notwithſtanding that he had waged three and thirty thouſand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vaſſals of Hadadezer twenty thouſand, 2 Sam. 1.

and of Maachah and Ishtob thirteen thousand (for which he disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great Armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites were by Joab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great loss or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retraited into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the walls, the other in their deserts adjoyning, till Joab was returned to Hierusalem.

Machah the North part of Traconitis remembred in Deut. 3. 14.

Ishtob or Thob a country near Gad under the rocks of Arnon.

2 Sam. 10.

Hadadezer hearing that Joab had dismissed his Army, assembled his forces again, and sent all the Companies that he could levy out of Mesopotamia; who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched toward the Syrian Army in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no less distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Jerusalem was towards the South-west. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off journey that ever he had) because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. He also possest himself of Thadmor* or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified; and this City was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had he two safe retraits, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach General of their Army. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers, footmen, and so Junius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the Army of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foot. So are the chariots taken in this battel numbred at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them, with the conductors, are included: so as there dyed of the Syrians in this war against David, before he forc't them to tribute, 100000. footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished, even to the last end of that State.

* See c. 18. sect. 2.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the party and confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lievtenant of his Armies to forrage and destroy their territory, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possest. The Kings Crown which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his own head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoil of the City. And though David stayed at Jerusalem, following the war of Uriah his wife, till such time as the City was brought to extremity, and ready to be entred: yet Joab in honour of David forbare the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arrival. To the people he used extream rigour (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them he tare with harrows, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kills, in which he baked tyle and brick.

Of Davids troubles in his reign, and of his forces.

BUt as victory begetteth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himself the giver of all goodness; so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise observation of his Laws and Commandements: For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (against whom he was wont to ask counsel from the Lord) he began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires: For he was not onely satisfied to take Uriah's wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but he imbrodered his adultery with Uriah's slaughter, giving order to his trusty servant Joab to marshal him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibility of prevailing. And that which could no less displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best servants and souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happiness, and his dayes then to come were filled with joyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-down ſorrows began again to ſpring, and thoſe perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an after-harveſt of many cares and diſcontentments. And if it had pleaſed GOD to take the witneſs of Davids own mouth againſt him, as David himſelf did againſt the Amalekite, which pretended to have ſlain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehenſion as the other was of the death he ſuffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his own errour in the perſon of another, to wit, of him that took the poor mans ſheep that had none elſe, the bereaver being Lord of many; He then vowed it to the living Lord, that ſuch a one ſhould die the death. And hereof, although it pleaſed God to pardon David for his life, which remiſſion the Prophet Nathan pronounced; yet he delivered him Gods juſtice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the ſword ſhall never depart from thy houſe, &c. becauſe thou haſt taken his wife to be thy wife, and haſt ſlain Uriah with the ſword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David loſt the child of adultery which he begot on Berſheba. Secondly, his own ſon Ammon, being in love with his half ſiſter Thamar, by the advice of his couſin-german the ſon of Shimeah Davids brother, poſſeſt her by force: which when he had performed, he thruſt her from him in a careleſs and deſpiteful manner. Two years after which foul and inceſtuous act, Abſalom cauſed him to be murthered at the feaſt of his ſheep-ſhearing: not perchance in revenge of Thamars raviſhment alone; but having it in his heart to uſurp the Kingdom, in which, becauſe he could not in any ſort be aſſured of Ammon, he thought his affairs greatly advanced by his deſtruction. So the one brother having raviſhed his own ſiſter, and then deſpiſed her; the other after a long diſſembled malice firſt made his own brother drunken, and then ſlaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the ſafeguard of Talmai King of Geſſur, near Damaſcus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abſalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly becauſe of the great affection of David towards his ſon) was brought again firſt to the Kings favour, and then to his preſence; he began inſtantly to practiſe againſt David his father, ſeeking by the pretence of common juſtice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equity, to win unto himſelf a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction threatned by the Lord as a puniſhment of Davids ſin.

2 Sam. 12. 9, 10.

2 Sam. 13.

2 Sam. 14.

The company which Abſalom gathered at the firſt were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Jeruſalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiouſly, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired unto him, and many troops of people from all places, he proclaimed himſelf King, and was by the people (whoſe hearts God had turned from their lawful Prince) accepted ſo readily, that David doubting to be ſet upon on the ſudden, durſt not truſt himſelf in his own City of Jeruſalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of ſurpriſe: but incamped in the fields and deſarts with ſome 600. of his guard, and few elſe. The Prieſts he left in Jeruſalem with the Ark of God, from whom he deſired to be advertiſed of thoſe things that chanced; to whom he directed Huſhai his truſty friend, and ſervant, praying him to make himſelf in all his outward actions and counſels of Abſaloms party and confederacy, thereby the better to diſcover unto him the purpoſes of Achitophel, a revolting Counſellour, whoſe practices he greatly doubted. And now when treaſon was in faſhion, Ziba alſo ſought to betray his maſter Mephiboſeth the ſon of Jonathan: And Shimei of the houſe of Saul (the fire of whoſe hatred Davids proſperity had ſmothered, but his adverſity illightned) holding himſelf upon the advantage of a mountain ſide, caſt ſtones at David, and moſt deſpightfully curſed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbad Abiſhai to purſue him for the preſent, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his ſon Salomon. Abſalom being now poſſeſt of Jeruſalem, was adviſed by Achitophel to uſe his fathers concubines in ſome ſuch publick place, as all Iſrael might aſſure themſelves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perſwaded, they would then reſolvedly adhere to Abſalom and his cauſe, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation between them. This ſalvage and impious (though crafty counſel) Achitophel indeed urged for his own reſpect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his deſtruction, who moſt of all other inflamed Abſalom againſt his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raiſe up evill againſt thee out of thine own houſe, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he ſhall lye with thy wives in the ſight of the Sun: for thou diddeſt it ſecretly, but I will do this thing before all Iſrael, and before the Sun. He alſo gave advice to Abſalom,

Absalom, that himself with an Army of

This delay in Absalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the loss of the one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occa-

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the same wherein Ishboseth himself in the war against David after Sauls death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the son of Nahash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Josephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdom, after Hanums overthrow: in thankfulness whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to Davids assistance Machir of Lodobar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the King and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Amasa Commander of the Army of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Maiors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruel by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him
2 Sam. 18 14. that Absalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to return and kill him, he himself with his own servants dispatcht him. It appeared also by the sequel that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the present advantage offered. 2 Sam. 18.

Hereof, together with news of the victory, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and sorrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a son, but as one that had out-lived all his worldly joys, and seen every delight of life interred. For he so hid himself from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, covered themselves also in the City, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himself before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himself to the Army. For first, he told him that he had discountenanced his faithful servants, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a love and constancy in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolvedly expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Absalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he urged, that it was generally believed, that he loved his enemies, and hated his friends; and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithful servants, but would more have joyed if they had all perished, and Absalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he used this prevalent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himself publickly to his men of war, that they would all that very night abandon him, and return: concluding with this fearful threatning, And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these over-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the City among the people, whom he assured of his love and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the Army of Absalom, to whom he promised the office of Lievtenantship; the same which Absalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandment. 2 Sam. 19. This

2 Sam. 19. 39. This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, vvhere in his paſſage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face: but this remiſſion vvas but external, as appeared afterward. He alſo accepted of Mephiboſheth his excuſe, whom Ziba had falſly accuſed and betrayed.

2 Sam. 19. 38. He alſo intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberal hoſt, to follow him to Jeruſalem, that he might reward his ſervice done him; who excuſing himſelf by his age, appointed his ſon Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this ſide Jordan, all the Tribes aſſembled, and after ſome contention which of them ought to have moſt intereſt in David, the Army brake, and David returned to Jeruſalem. But Sheba the ſon of Bichri, a Benjamite, of the faction of the houſe of Saul; finding ſome diſcontent among the Iſraelites, withdrew them from David, as from a ſtranger in whom they had no intereſt, and it ſeemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare ſtill a good affection to the iſſues of their firſt King. David imployed his reconciled Captain Amaſa, to give him contentment, and to witneſs his truſt, as alſo becauſe he conceived that Amaſa had intereſt in thoſe revolts of Iſrael more than Joab had. He received commandement from David to aſſemble the Army within three dayes, which he foreſlowed: but being onward on his way, Abiſhai, Joabs brother, was ſent after him, with Davids guard and beſt Soudiers, whom alſo Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amaſa near Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gave him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no leſs jealous of Amaſa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the ſame manner, and out of the ſame impatient ambition. This done, he purſued Sheba; and finding him incloſed in Abel, aſſaulted the City with that fury, that the Citizens by the perſwaſions of a wiſe woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Joab over the walls: which done, he retreated his Army to Jeru-

2 Sam. 20. 12. ſalem, and commanded, as before, all the Hoaſt of Iſrael.

The next act of David, was the delivery of Sauls ſons or kinſmen to the Gibeonites, whom thoſe Citizens hung up in revenge of their fathers cruelty. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three years, came by reaſon of Saul and his houſe, to wit, for the ſlaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this ſatisfaction, both becauſe he had warrant from God himſelf, as alſo, if we may judge humanely, to rid himſelf of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, aſwell in the preſent as in the future, be greatly moleſted and indangered; onely he ſpared Miphiboſheth the ſon of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, and for his oath and vow to God.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two ſons of Riſpah, whom 2 Sam. 21. ſhe bare unto Saul, and the five ſons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom ſhe bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibeonites: Junius calls this Michol the ſiſter of her that was Davids wife, ſhe whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her huſband; the ſame which is named Merab in the firſt of Samuel the eighteenth, who was firſt promiſed to David when he ſlew Goliah in the Valley Raphaim: and becauſe it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any humane reſpect in the delivery of her children, it is onely known to God.

Now where the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better tranſlation were out of the Hebrew word here uſed, having an eclipſis or defect, and ſignifieth, as I am informed, one of the ſame kindred, as in the 19. verſe of the ſame one and twentieth chapter it is ſaid of Goliah, whoſe ſpear was weighty as a Weavers beam, when as by the ſame eclipſis it muſt be underſtood by the brother of Goliah; Goliah himſelf being formerly ſlain.

As by the death of Sauls children God ſecured the houſe of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: ſo did he ſtrengthen both the King and Nation againſt forreign enemies by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Iſrael is not known to have had at any time before or after. Thirty Captains of thouſands there were, all men of mark, and great reputation in war. Over theſe vvere ſix Collonels, vvhoſe valour vvas ſo extraordinary, that it might be vvell held as miraculous. Theſe Collonels had ſome difference of place and honour, vvhich ſeemeth to have been given upon meer conſideration of their vertue. For Abiſhai the brother of Joab, vvho in the vvar againſt the Ammonites and Aramites was Lievtenant, and commanded half the army, could not attain to the honour of the firſt rank, but was fain to reſt contented with being principal of the three Collonels of the ſecond order, notwithſtanding his nearneſs of blood unto the King, the flouriſhing eſtate of his own houſe, and his vvell approved ſervices.

All

All these Collonels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seem to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readiness for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawn out, if need required, into the field, very far exceeded thirty thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Saul's time, and been hardned with his adversities. Others there were very many, and principal men in their several Tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul; but these Captains and Collonels (who with Joab, that was General of all the Kings Forces, make up the number of 37.) were the special men of War, and reckoned as David's Worthies. The long reign of David, as it is known to have consumed many of these excellent men of War, so may it probably be ghessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the sons of Zervia, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

2 Sam. 23. 39.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered, that he had reigned now 33. years or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seven years of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers Throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he again displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Joab, with other Captains of his Army, who after nine moneths and twenty dayes travel, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to bear Arms, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hundred thousand, besides Levi and Benjamin, where-
2 Sam. 24. 1 Chro. 21. of in Juda and the Cities thereof, five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himself to which he pleased; to wit, seven years Famine; three moneths War, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a general pestilence to last three dayes: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and left himself subject to that cruel disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth this divine reason, For his mercies are great. 2 Sam. 14.

§. VIII.

Of the last acts of David; Adonijahs faction; the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

LAstly, when he grew weak and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of Women, he was yet advised to lie in the arms of a young and well-complexioned Maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak estate of body, when he was in a manner bed-rid, Adonijah his eldest son (Ammon and Absalom being now dead) having drawn unto his party that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdom after his Father. For being the eldest now living of David's sons, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and born of a Mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by Saint Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Bersabe the Mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithful promise, that Salomon, her son should reign after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing unto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling unto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benajah the Captain of his Guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himself used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinary and choice men of War, the Cherethites, and Pelethites, shewed himself to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two especial cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the Land, which might be disturbed by some Rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to advance, and make the business publick. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a 1 Reg. 3.

Parliament,

Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the several Tribes, all
1 Ch. 28. 1. the Captains and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who did repair unto Jerusalem.

In this Assembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his own title to the Crown, shewing that the Kingdom was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himself was pleased to make choice of him among all his Fathers sons. In like manner he said that God himself had appointed Salomon by name to be his Successour; whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his son to conform themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to go forward in this Work of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build.
1 Chro. 29. Then produced he the pattern of the Work, according to the form which God himself had appointed; and so laying open his own preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himself had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of silver, they added unto it seven thousand of gold, and ten thousand of silver, besides brass, iron, and Jewels, heartily rejoycing in the advancement of so religious a Work. This business being so well dispatched, a solemn Feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was again anointed King, and received fealty of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sons of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himself even in the hands of death, first exhorted his son to exercise the same courage and strength of mind, which himself had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he uttered
1 King. 2. 3. these mighty words; Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his wayes, and keep his statutes, and his commandements, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which GOD fastned the successions, and prosperity of his issues. For this
1 King. 1. 20. done (saith GOD himself) Thou shalt not want one of thy Posterity to sit upon the Throne of Israel.

Secondly, he advised him concerning Joab; who out of doubt had served David from the first assault of Jerusalem to the last of his Wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, saving that he fastened himself to Adonijah (his master yet living) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevenged, so was it his will that Joab should drink of the same cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himself had unjustly strooken others withal, Qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner and Amasa of their lives, having against the one the pretence only of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slain in the time of War, and could not avoid him: against the other but a meer jealousie of his growing great in the favour of David. And though Joab assured himself that Abner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him, or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised up Benhajah the son of Jehojadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For David giveth this cause to Salomon against Joab, that he slew the Captains of the 1 King. 2. Hoast of Israel, and shed bloud of battel in peace; and to this apparent and just cause, it is not improbable but that David remembred the ill affection of Joab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifest by the untimely setting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed against David, of which in these words he put his son Salomon in mind; Thou knowest also what Joab the son of Serviah did to me, &c. 1 King. 2. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Absalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words used to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Absalom; or whether it were the publishing of Davids letter unto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of War do oftentimes behave themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot miss them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrown many a worthy man otherwise deserving great honour and respect.

He also gave order to Salomon to rid himself of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at David, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time him- 1 King. 2. self lived, yet being dust and in the grave, he slew him by the hand of Salomon his son. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seventh of England had his pattern, when he gave order to Henry the Eighth to execute Pool as soon as himself was buried, having made promise to the King of Spain, when he delivered Pool unto him, that while he lived he would never put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yeeld unto Salomon any such great profit or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumæa, and Resin of Damascus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize upon 1 King. 11 Salomon, hearing that David slept with his Fathers, and that Joab the Captain of the Hoast was dead. Now when David had reigned in all forty years, to wit, in Hebron 7. years, and in Jerusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces, he so far exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailty apart, he was said by God himself to be a man according to his own heart. The Psalms which he wrote, witness his piety, and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Paulinus: David Simonides noster, Pindarus, & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in decachordo Psalterio ab inferis suscitat resurgentem; David (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, he playeth Christ on his Harp, and on a ten-stringed Psalter he raiseth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightsomly and lively than all the rest.

The book of the Psalms, saith Glycas, was divided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalms were written by David, it is diversly disputed. For Athan. in Synop. Hier. Epist. 134 Lyran. in exp. 1. Psal. Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceive divers Authors answering the titles of the several Psalms, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that only 73. Psalms were composed by David himself, namely, those which are intituled ipsius David. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Barachia, eleven other on the sons of Korath; and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the Vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalms which David wrote not, Sixt. Senensis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrry to Hierome, maketh one of David's singers) Asaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Eziaira, Idithum, and the three sons of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes David the sole Author of all the Psalms, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms only to David, which are over-written ipsius David, and the rest intituled ipsi David, to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce Evangelica Salvatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quòd ipse David in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede à dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospel refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himself in the spirit called Christ his Lord; because the 109. Psalm begins thus: The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his Testimonies are used both by Christ and the Apostles, and he was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

Vide Sixt. Senens. lib. 2. fol. 100 & 101. Aug. de Civ. Dei, l. 17. c. 14.

His Story, and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. vers. 19. For the several parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were, as it seems, written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the siege sought for succour from David, and that he stayed Neuter in that War. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time 'twixt David and the Trojan War. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Sampson Judges of Israel, about the Worlds year 2848. and David died in the year 2991.

Of the treasures of David and Salomon.

HIs treasures were exceeding great. For Vers. 14. it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brass and iron passing all weight, which is more than any King in the World possest besides himself, and his son, to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty and three cart-load, and a third of a cart-load of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver, or six thousand pound sterling to every cart-load, besides threescore and seventeen millions of French Crowns, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound:

pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear, seeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any soveraign power to make levies: but when they went to the wars they were followed by such voluntaries as the several tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possest by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiss to consider how David within the space of not very many years, might amass up such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it self a great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great means. It seems that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his 9. book and last chapter de Præparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navy in Melanis (or, as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a city of Arabia, and from thence sent men to dig for gold in the Iland Urphe, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland was in the red Sea: from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury, Pineda l.4. de Rebus Salomonis, c.1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other ways to gather riches. Much land doubtless he gained by conquest from the Canaanites and Philistims, besides those fruitful vallies near Jordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israelites. These demains belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his wars, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written 1 *Chro.*17. that Jahonathan was over his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the towns; that Ezri was over the labourers that tilled his ground, Simei over the vineyards, and Sabdi over the store of the wine; Baal Hanan over the olive trees, and Joash over the store of the oyle: also that he had herdsmen that had charge over his cattel, both in the high lands and in the plains, over his Sheep, Camels and Asses. And this custom of enriching themselves by husbandry and cattel, the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after Davids time. For we read of Pharaoh, that he spake to Joseph to appoint some of his brethren, or of their servants, to be rulers over his cattel. Gen.47. 2 Chro.26. We read of Uzzia, that he loved husbandry, had much cattel, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we read it in all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and Flocks; whereof it were needless to cite Augeas and Admetus, or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not imployed in husbandry, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainful professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions, which doubtless were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tohu and others) we may add the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis; By the law of capitation, or head money, every man rich or poor paying half a sicle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous sum in that Kingdom: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seventy thousand fighting men were numbred by Joab. 1 Chro.21. Now although this law of capitation be thought by some very learned, not to have been perpetual (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confess is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practise. And by these means might hee be able to leave those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seem that of this great mass of gold and silver left by David, the least part was his own in private; and so will it appear the less wonderfull that he left so much. Of his own liberality we find, that hee gave to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand talents of silver: a great sum, but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been having received continual encrease, without any loss or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Joshuah. The revenues of the Sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the dayly expences, & maintained the Priests & Levites) were partly raised out of the head mony before mentioned; partly out of the spoils Numb. 31. 27. gotten in War. For all the booty was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the Country received benefit of the Victory, yet so, that the Souldiers had a far greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fifty, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given to the Souldiers; namely, one hundred and one thousand part of the whole booty. So in the spoil of Midian, thirty two thousand Women being taken, the Army had sixteen
Num. 31. 40. thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand given to the Army, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute; Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means, the lesser that the Army was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were fain to undergo more than ordinary travel in domestical affairs, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwayes certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some special commandement, as when all the gold, and silver, and other mettals found in Jerico,
Jos 6. 19. were consecrated unto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and people, as when after the Victory obtained against the Midianites without the loss of one man, all Jewels, Num. 31. 50. Bracelets, Earerings, and the like, were offered up, as voluntary presents.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and trodden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the mony and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purcha-

For that this treasury was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident; seeing that before the time of David and his Lievtenant Joab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoils obtained in War, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains of other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former Victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have been the meer fruits of his own industry.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly revenues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also six rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that Voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth year of his reign, and ruled forty years. Besides this, all Judæa and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Ituræa; all of Idumæa, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizites, Hivites, Jebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished though subjected.

A Ta'ent of gold is 770. French crowns. 1 King. 10. 14.

1 King c. 9. v. 10. & 10. v. 19.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by David, who after 40. years reign, and 70. years of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the City of David. It is written by Josephus that there was hid in David's Tomb a marvellous quantity of treasures, insomuch as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chasmanæi, or race of Macchabees, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred years after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem; and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding mass of gold and silver therein. And it was an antient custome to bury treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they inriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did bury so much treasure in his Fathers grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which he was fain to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left unto him: were it notwithal considered that his want of mony grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulchre of David the Scriptures have no mention, but only the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of burial. Yet the Monuments of these Kings, as (by relation of the Duke of Ulica) they remained within these thirty years, and are like to remain still, are able to make report credible of the cost bestowed upon them.

Of the Philistims, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with David.

OF the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken.

They descended of Casloim, who, according to Isidor and Josephus, was one of the sons of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities or petty Principalities, namely, Azotus or Asdod, Gaza or Aczaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this Nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

Isid. l. 9. 19 Jos. l. 8. Ant. 17.

1 Sam. 6.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abraham's Wife.

Gen. 20.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of Famine, Abimilech then residing at Gerar, in the border of Idumæa; which Abimelech fancied Isaac his Wife, as his Father had done Sara.

Gen. 26.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Aristocratical. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

Jud. 16 1 Sam. 18. 29. 1 Sam. 21. 11.

After him we read of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive servant, what time the seeking of his servant was the loss of his life. Jeremy the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palæstin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the Wars of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

1 King. 2.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii King of Alba, called Latinus Silvius, who is said to have ruled that part of Italy fifty years. And about his fourteenth year Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontidæ, without regal name governed Athens during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of soveraignty, but in honour of Codrus only. For when the Græcians of Doris, a region between Phocis, and the mountain of Oeta, sought counsel from the Oracle, for their success in the Wars against the Athenians, it was answered, that then undoubtedly they should prevail and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any Victory against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himself from his own Forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Camp of the Dorians, and killing the first he encountred, was himself forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Assyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. year of David, and held it 38. years.

Near the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraclidæ, the son of Euristhenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclidæ in Lacedæmon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called Agidæ, for many years after. He restored the Laconians to their former liberty: he overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: he condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavery; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helots.

In like sort from the Sclavi came the Word Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the Country of Illyria, and made it their own by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselves by a new name, Slavos, which is in their language Glorious. But in after times (that warmer Climate having thawed their Northern hardiness, and not ripened their Wits) when they were trodden down, and made servants with their neighbours, the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sence it is now current through many Countries.

Other

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and ſomewhat later about the 23. year of David, and ſay that Acheſtratus was the fourth King of this race, the ſame whom Euſebius calls Labotes, and ſets him in the 13. year of Salomon. Euſeb. in Chro.

In the tenth year of Acheſtratus, Androclus the third ſon of Codrus, aſſiſted by the Iones, built Epheſus in Caria, who after the adjoyning of the Iſle of Samos to his Territory, was ſlain by the Carians, whoſe Country he uſurped. He was buried (ſaith Pauſanias) in one of the gates of Epheſus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being ſet over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had ſubdued the Ionians (the next Province to Epheſus on the ſeacoaſt of Aſia the leſs) he enlarged his Dominions upon the Æoles, which joyneth to Ionia: and that his poſterity governed the Cities of Epheſus and Erythræ by the name of Baſilidæ in Strabo his own time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came hither out of Peloponneſus, I have * ſpoken already upon occaſion of the return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus, wherein, with the Dores, they expelled the Achæi, and inhabited their places in that Land: though this of the Iones ſucceeded that of the Heraclidæ 100. years.

The City of Epheſus became exceeding famous: firſt, for the Temple of Diana therein built, which had in length 425. foot, and 220. in breadth, ſuſtained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70. foot high: whereof 27. were moſt curiouſly graven, and all the reſt of choice marble poliſht, the work being firſt ſet out by Cteſiphon of Gnoſſos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the firſt that received the Chriſtian faith, of which Timothy was Biſhop; to whom, and to the Epheſians, Saint Paul wrote his Epiſtle ſo entituled. The other City poſſeſt by Androclus in Æolis, was alſo univerſally ſpoken of by reaſon of Sybilla, ſurnamed Erythræa, who lived 740. years before Chriſt was born. S. Auguſtine avoweth that a Roman Proconſul ſhewed him in an ancient Greek copy certain verſes of this Propheteſs, which began (as S. Auguſtine changed them into Latine) in theſe words: Jeſus Chriſtus Dei Filius, Salvator; Jeſus Chriſt Son of God, the Saviour. Plin. 2. c. 58. & l. 7. c 37.

About the time that Joab beſieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to govern in Ægypt, the ſame that was father in law to Salomon whoſe Epiſtles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Euſebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the City of Magneſia in Aſia the leſs founded, the ſame which is ſeated upon the river Mæander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this Territory are the beſt horſes of the leſſer Aſia bred, whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Minyæ gens cognita remis.

About the ſame time Cuma in Campania was built by the Inhabitants of Chalcis in Eubœa, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cumæans of Æolis, ſaying, that to the one of theſe people the government was given, with condition that the other ſhould give name to the City. Of this Cuma was Ephores the famous ſcholar of Iſocrates. Serv. in Æneid. 3. Strabo. l 5.

Euſebius and Caſſiodor find the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. year of David, but much miſtaken. For the father of Dido was Metinos the ſon of Badezor, brother to Jezabel, who married Achab King of Iſrael; and between the death of David, and the firſt of Achab, there were waſted about 45. years.

In this time alſo Acaſtus lived, the ſecond of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in deſcent before the State changed into a Magiſtracy of ten years. Some writers make it probable, that the Æolians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Oreſtes, poſſeſt the City and Iſland of Thebes about this time. In the 32. 3ear of David, Hiram began to reign in Tyre, according to Joſephus, who ſaith in his twelfth year Solomon began the work of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Joſephus, to miſreckon times, which in this point he doth ſo ſtrangely, as if he knew not how at all to to caſt any accompt. For it is manifeſt, that Hiram ſent Meſſengers, and Cedars unto David, ſoon after his taking of Jeruſalem, which was in the beginning of David's reign over Iſrael, when as yet he had reigeed onely ſeven years in Hebron over the houſe of Juda. Wherefore it muſt neees be that Hiram had reigned above 30. years before Salomon; unleſs more credit ſhould be given to thoſe Tyrian records which are cited by Joſephus, than to the plain words of Scripture contradicting them. For, that it was the ſame Hiram which lived both with David and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifeſt. Euſeb. id Chro Herod. in vit. Hom. & Strob. l. 14. *Ant. 8 & cont. CHAP. XVIII.

Of SOLOMON.

§. I.

Of the eſtabliſhing of Salomon: of birth-right, and the cauſe of Adonijah's death, and of Salomons wiſdom.

SALOMON, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathan, began to reign over Juda and Iſrael, in the year of the world 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: he was alſo called Jediddia, or Theophilus by Nathan, becauſe the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, diſpatched Embaſſadors towards him, congratulating his eſtabliſhment: a cuſtom between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in like ſort ſalute Hanum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom. 2 Sam. 10.

The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his reign were peaceable. For ſoon after David's death, he cauſed his brother Adonijah to be ſlain by Benaiah the ſon of Jehojada, taking occaſion from Adonijah his deſiring by Berſheba, that the young maid Abiſhag (which lay in David's boſome in his later daies, to keep him warm) might be given to him. Whatſoever he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and ſought the Kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is ſaid that a word is enough to the wiſe, and he that ſees but the claw may know whether it be a Lion or no: ſo it may ſeem that to the quick-ſighted wiſdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonſtration of a new treaſon. For they which had been Concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wiſhed Abſolom to take his fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. 2 Sam. 16. 21. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but ſhut them up, and they remained widowed until their death. And this it ſeems was the depth of Iſboſheths quarrel againſt Abner, for having his fathers Concubine. 2 Sam. 2. 3. And ſome ſignification of this cuſtom may ſeem too in the words of God by Nathan to David; I have given thee thy Maſters houſe, and thy Maſters wives. And in the words of Saul upbraiding Jonathan, that he had choſen David to the ſhame of the nakedneſs of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was ſome reference to this purpoſe of Adonijah, to marry with her that was alwaies preſent with David in his later daies, and who belike knew all that was paſt, for the conveying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There may be divers further occaſions; as either that he would learn ſuch things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perſwade her to forge ſome ſtrange tale about David's laſt Teſtament, or any thing elſe that might prejudice the title of Salomon. 1 Sam. 20. 30.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the cuſtoms of the Jews: yet the Kings of the Jews were ſo abſolute, as they did therein, & in all elſe what they pleaſed. Some examples alſo they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to uſe this paternal authority in transferring the birth-right to a younger ſon: namely, of Jacobs diſheriting Reuben, and giving the birth-right (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Joſeph: of whom he made two Tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appeareth by the words of Berſabe and Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For, as for popular election, that it was neceſſary to confirm, or that the refuſal of the people had authority to fruſtrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdom, it no where appears in the ſtories of the Jews. It is ſaid indeed that the people made Saul King at Galgal: that is, they acknowledged and eſtabliſhed him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elſewhere the phraſe of chooſing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they ſhould not make themſelves a King, it is ſaid, Thou ſhalt make him King whom the Lord ſhall chuſe. 1 Kings 2. 15. Deut. 21. 15. Filium exoſæ agnoſcito, dando ei portionem duorum: nam ipſius eſt jus primogenitorum. 1 Reg. 1. 17 & 20. 29. & 34. 1 King. 1. 1. v. 20. & 27. 1 Sam. 11. 14. Deut. 17. 30.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the ſame time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himſelf alſo of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had adviſed him: he diſplaced alſo the Prieſt Abiathar, who took part with Adonijah againſt him: but

1 Kings 2. but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because he had born the Ark of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, he took the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dream, bad him ask what he would at his hands: Salomon chooseth Wisdom, which pleased God. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy self long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy self, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words: by which we may inform our selves, what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coveting after long life in respect of our selves, cannot but proceed of self-love, which is the root of all impiety: the desire of private riches is an affection of covetousness, which God abhorreth; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his justice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God; but because Salomon desired Wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to give him with all that which he desired not. And I have also given thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of Wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures, the Scripture testifieth; though no doubt the chief excellency of Salomons wisdom, 1 Kings 4. 33. was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdom: whence, as it were for an exam- 1 King 3. 9 ple of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soon he judged the controversie between the two harlots.

§. II.
Of Salomons building and glory.

HE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For 1 Chro. 22. 6. like as it is written of David, that He called Salomon his son, and charged him to build a house for the Lord of Israel: so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine precept to these words, Behold, a son is born unto thee, &c. He shall build an house for my Name. Tost. 9. 26. in 1 Chro.

He began the work of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Esiongabar to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a work. For, that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the form and example was given by God himself) many learned men have written; as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, & others, to whom I refer the Reader. 1 Kings 6. 1 Chro. 28. 29.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand every month by course: he also used 80. thousand Masons in the Mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceived, he selected out of the Proselites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his work; so as he paid and employed in all, one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men; in which number the Sidonians, which were far more skilful in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I think) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring down the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in raffs to Joppe, or the next port to Jerusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain, that all but the thirty thousand Carpenters, and the over-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of this Timber and Stone, Salomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of Wheat, & twenty measures of pure Oyl yearly. Eusebius out of Eupalemus in the ninth book of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left us a Copy of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the same as Haram and Hiram) King of Tyre, in these words: 1 King. 5. 9 1 Kings 5. 11.

REx Salomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœniciæ regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram creavit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te ut artifices atque fabros ad ædificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King

King Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting. You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the Kingdom: and when my father commanded me to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, he commanded also that I should write to you: I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

Suron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœniciæ Rex, Salomoni Regi salutem. Lectis literis, gratias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros, ministrosq; ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia hominum octaginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Judææ, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessariis non egeant, & Templo Dei condito, ad nos redeant.

Suron of Tyre, Sydon and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: When I read your Letters, I gave God thanks who hath installed you in your fathers kingdom. And because you write that Carpenters and Workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent you fourscore thousand men, and a Master-builder, a Tyrian, born of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be careful that all necessaries be provided for them; and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us.

Jos ant. l. 8. c. 2.

The Copies of these Letters were extant in Josephus time, as himself affirmeth, and to be seen (saith he) Tàm in nostris quàm in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our own, as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different terms, as the Reader may find in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse between Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Josephus set it down, but so, that in substance there is little difference between the one and the other.

1 King. 5. from the 1. v. to the 9.

The like Letter in effect Salomon is said to have written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Salomon, find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gave Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eusebius, I do not find any such addition of magnus in Eusebius, in the last chapter of that ninth book; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth book and second chapter of the Jews Antiquities: it being a vain title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by mean persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightiness.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had been the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Joshua's time: so did he Gaza of the Philistims: he built Berothon, Gerar, and the Millo or munition of Jerusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in favour of Salomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their City. The place and Territory he gave Salomons Wife for a dowry. And it is probable, that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts again before they were sent for; and in his son Rehoboams time Shesback this mans successor did sack Jerusalem it self.

Jos. ant. l. 8. c. 2.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Jordan, and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the desart of Juda, or (as Josephus thinks) Palmira in the desart of Syria; which Palmyra, because it stood on the utmost border of Salomons dominion to the Northeast of Libanus, and was of Davids conquest when he wan Damascus, it may seem that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Josephus calls this place Thadamora, by which name (saith he) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his book of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building, Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hirams servants; Salomon offered Hiram twenty towns in or near the upper Galilee, but because they stood in an unfruitful and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territory called Chabul.

Jos. l. 8. ant. c. 2.

Jos l. 8. ant. c. 2.

These towns, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod Gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis Gentilis erat. Not that it was possest by the Gentiles (saith Nauclerus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were, it is true that Salomon in the 21. year fortified those places which Hiram refused. Further, he made a journey into Syria Zobah, and established his tributes; the first and last war (if in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Desarts of Idumæa, from whence he visited Eziongaber and Eloth the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the Red sea: which Cities I have described in the Story of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two strange passages about Affrick.

HEre Salomon prepared his Fleet of ships for India, with whom Hiram joyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert seamen. From this part of Arabia which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet pass to the East-India, which was not far off, namely, to Ophir, one of the Illands of the Molucca's, a place exceeding rich in gold: witness the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, do yet plant in those Illands of the East at Manilia, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with less labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spain.

The return which was made by these Ships amounted to four hundred and twenty talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written 450. talents: whereof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of men; and 420. talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crowns, came clear. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred sixty and six talents of gold; that sum, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yearly, and which came to him, besides those profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a Countrey in the East-Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedy return to Jerusalem from the East-Indies, than in three years; and that Tharsis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath been already declared in the first book. c. 8. sect. 9. & 10. 13. Lib 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 6. & 15.

Only it remaineth that I should speak somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Bætica, would fain have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tartessus, which is the Southwest corner of that Province, to be the Tharsis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seems, but for love of his own Countrey, and because of some affinity of sound between Tharsis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seem strange that it should be three years ere they that took ship in the Red sea, should return from the East-Indies to Jerusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metal, and in their other traffick, and in their land-carriages between Jerusalem and the Red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that we have no need to make Salomons men to go many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterran sea, and so (besides many wonderful inconveniences, and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome land-carriage between Jerusalem and the Red sea, through dry, desart, and the thievish Countreys: and within 30. miles of Jerusalem at Joppe, or some other haven in Salomons own Country, have laden and unladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis, in largeness greater than all Africk and Asia, being swallowed up in the Atlantick Ocean, hindred Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this he alledgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamity happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the straits of Gades were filled with mud, and made unpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterran sea; or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channel, should be filled filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Iland is supposed to have stood; or that Salomons ships being in the Red sea, should neglect the golden Mines in the East Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the Red sea, than any in Spain) to seek gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa; it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himself that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East-Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parts no less quantity of gold (the small territory which he there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

De rebus Sal. l. 4. c. 10. 11. As appears he took a ship at Japho or Joppe. c. 1. v. 2.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreams of: supposing whereas Jonas sailing to Tharsis the City of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming above twelve thousand English miles along the Mediterran seas, and so through the straights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast up Jonas upon the shore of the Red sea, that so he might have perhaps some six miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninive. This conceit he grounds onely upon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the Red sea. But in Jonas c. 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his own rule (which elsewhere he giveth us) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale, finished in three dayes, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Jonas in the belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we send it back unto him, keeping his own rule, which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And again, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda. Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor delivered without cause, nor feigned at pleasure. Therefore we leave this man in his dreams, which (were he not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our story of Salomon.

Jug. 8.

The Queen of Saba's coming from far to Salomon (as seems, from Arabia Fœlix, and not, as some think, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions; those are set down at large in the Text. But herein Josephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Saba Nicaules, the successor (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Meneus the Founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proved that the Queen was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the father in law of Salomon. Yea, above three hundred years after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Josias King of Juda.

Joseph. ant. 8. 1, 2.

1 King. c. 23. 2 Chron. c. 25. Jer. c. 46. v. 2.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garrisons fourteen thousand Chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court every day thirty measures of fine flower, threescore measures of wheat, one hundred sheep, besides stags and fallow Deer, bugles and fowl; four thousand stalls of horses he had for his Chariots and other uses, and for the twelve thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stalls in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but four thousand stalls or teems, and in every teem ten horses, as Junius and the Geneva understand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda; to which Junius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrack. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Josephus writes them, Athan, Æman, Chalceus and Donan the sons of Hemon. He spake three thousand Proverbs, and his Songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publick Records of Civil causes, and not Ecclesiastical, therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into Gods Book.

1 King. 4. 31.

§. IV.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he lived.

NOw as he had plenty of all other things, so had he no scarcity of women. For besides his seven hundred Wives, he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he took Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when he fell a doting, his Wives turned his heart after other gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumæa, Rezin of Damascus, and by Jeroboam his own servant, and one of the masters of his works, who by the ordinance of God tare from his son Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territory he had. Deus dum in peccatores animadvertit, aliorum peccatis utitur, quæ ipse non fecit: God punishing sinners, useth the sins of others, which he himself wrought not.

P. Mart. in reg.

In the reign of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other works of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Forty years he reigned; how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to gheſs at the truth in this case is, by considering the actions of David before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the years which they consumed, and consequently learn the true, or most likely year of his nativity. Seven years David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth year he took Jerusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him in the year following. The bringing home of the Ark seems to have been in the tenth year of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the year ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, living in rest. After this he had wars with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites, and Edomites, which must needs have held him five years, considering the Aramites of Damasco raised war against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in every of these wars, he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely, that these services occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering camps in use, but at convenient seasons of the year Kings went forth to war, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their Armies, partly upon the spoil of the enemies country, partly upon the private provision which every souldier made for himself. The 17. year of David, in which he took Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the year following to have begun the war with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to tryal of a battel (for Joab after the victory, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the causes and preparations for that war, taking up all the Summer. Davids personal expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer under his own allegeance, appears manifestly to have been the next years work, wherein he did cut off all means of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab, and Idumæa being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it must have been the 20. year of Davids reign, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Joab to besiege Rabba, and finished the war of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Uriahs wife. So one half of Davids reign was very prosperous: in the other half he felt great sorrow, by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heavy judgment laid upon him by God for his foul and bloody offence.

2 King. 7. v. 1.

2 Sam. c 11. v. 1.

1 Sam. 8. 17. v. 17. & 18.

Now very manifest it is, that in the year after the death of that child which was begotten in adultery, Salomon was born, who must needs therefore have been nineteen years old or thereabout when he began to reign at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. year of his fathers reign, who reigned in all forty.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing Actions: for two years passed ere Absalom slew his brother Ammon; three years ere his father pardoned him, and two years more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seems to have been one years work. So the rebellion it self, with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa, and the rest, may well seem to have been in the 30. year of Davids reign.

Whether the three years of famine should be reckoned apart from the last years of war with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needful to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the ten remaining years of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for the three years of famine, for four years of war, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his own last infirmity, and dispoſing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seems that the war with the Philistims was but one years work, and ended in three or four fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob near unto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This war the Philistims undertook, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Davids old age: for he fainted now in the battel, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himself himself unto danger any more. So David had six or seven years of rest, in which time it is likely that many of his great men of War dyed (being of his own age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken party of Joab the son of Zervia.

1 King. 2. 9. & 3. 7. At this time it might both truly be said by David to Salomon, Thou art a wise man; and by Salomon to God, I am but a young child; for nineteen years of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Nevertheless there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himself a child, that he was but eleven years old when he began to reign. Of these Rabbi Salomon seems the first Author, whom other of great learning and judgment have herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps upon 2 Sam 15. 7. that which is said of Absaloms rebellion, that it was after forty years, which they understood as years of Davids reign. But whereas Rehoboam the son of Salomon was 41. years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himself but a child of nine or ten years old; the difference between their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned 40. years) were but eleven years old when his reign began. To avoid this inconvenience, Josephus allows 80. years of reign to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this opinion, construed the words of Josephus, as if they included all the years of Salomon's life. But by such reckoning he should have been 40. years old at his Fathers death; and consequently should have been born long before his Father had won Jerusalem; which is a manifest untruth. Wherefore the 40. years remembred in Absaloms rebellion, may either seem to have reference to the space between Davids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickedness, or perhaps be read (according to Josephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) four years; which passed between the return of Absalom to Jerusalem, and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomons Writings.

THere remain of Salomons Works, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanity of humane nature; in the third, he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Book intituled, The Wisdom of Salomon (which some give unto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make us think it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientiæ (saith Hierome) qui Salomonis inscribitur, Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The Stile of the Book of wisdom, which is ascribed to Salomon, savoureth of the Grecian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Book, and twentieth Chapter of the City of God, that the Author of that Book hath a direct foretelling of the passion of Christ in these words: Circumveniamus justum, quoniam insuavis est nobis, &c. Let us circumvent the righteous, for he is unpleasing to us, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh us for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himself the son of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Books of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report, that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graved the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which (they say) Ezechias pulled down, because the people, neglecting help from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Hier. ad Cromatium. Sap. 2. S. Sen. fol. 62. Reinecc. in Jul. Hist.

Of Salomons Books of Invocations, and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expel evil spirits, Josephus hath written at large, though (as I conceive) rather out of his own invention, or from some uncertain report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the root in Salomon's ring dispossest divers persons of evil spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly, so strange an example of humane frailty hath never been read of as this King: who having received Wisdom from God himself, in honour of whom, and for his onely service, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Judæa, not by the law of Nature, but by the love of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodness, of which he was more liberal to this King, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Syracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time, and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house to his Name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a floud? Thy mind covered the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus he concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loyns to Women, and wast overcome by thy body; thou didst stain thine honour, and hast defiled thy posterity, and hast brought wrath upon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly, cap. 27.

to

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

NEar the beginning of Salomons reign, Agesilaus the third of the Heraclidæ in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedæmon; and soon after Silvius Alba, the fourth of the Silvii, swayed those Kingdoms: Laosthenes then governing Assyria, Agastus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In the six and twentieth of Salomons reign, Hiram of Tyre dyed, to whom Baliastrus succeeded, and reigned seventeen years, after Mercators account; who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sons. Josephus gives him fewer years. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antolicus finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted between the death of Hiram and the reign of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac or Shishak (as our English Geneva terms him) began to govern in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sosachis; Josephus, Susac; Cedrenus, Susesinus; Eusebius in the colume of the Egyptian Kings, Smendes; and in that of the Hebrews, Susac. Josephus in the eighth of his Antiquities, reproveth it as an errour in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the Acts of Susac to Sesostris, which perchance Herodotus might have done by comparison, accounting Sesac another Sesostris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostris, I have spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: onely in this he was reproved, that he caused four of his captive Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seen, and to ride in triumph: one of which four, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sesostris was carried out to take the air, cast his head continually back upon the two foremost wheels next him; which Sesostris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: to whom the captive King answered, That in those he beheld the instability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheel was suddenly carried about, and became the highest, and the upmost part was as suddenly turned downward, and under all: which when Sesostris had judiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like servitude in the future. Of this Sesostris, and that he could not be taken for Sesac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding. Hist. Miscel. l. 17.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomons Successors until the end of Jehosaphat.

§. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings; the defection of the ten Tribes, and Jeroboams Idolatry.

REhoboam the Son of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitess, now forty years old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was annointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the return of Jeroboam as yet in Egypt, since he fled thither, fearing Salomon. After his arrival the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quam metui; So should his Empire (saith Josephus) be more assured, if he desired rather to be beloved than feared: whereof he took three dayes to deliberate before his answer; of whom therefore it could not be said as of David, that Ant. l. 8. c. 3.

that he was wiſer than all his Teachers. For as of himſelf he knew not how to reſolve, ſo had he not the judgement to diſcern of Counſels; which is the very teſt of wiſdom in Princes, and in all men elſe. But notwithſtanding that he had conſulted with thoſe grave and adviſed men, that ſerved his Father, who perſwaded him by all means to ſatisfie the multitude: he was tranſported by his familiars and favourites, not onely to continue on the backs of his ſubjects thoſe burdens which greatly cruſht them; but (vaunting falſly of greatneſs exceeding his fathers) he threatned in ſharp, or rather in terrible terms, to lay yet heavier, and more unſupportable loads on them. But as it appeared in the ſucceſs, thoſe younger adviſers greatly miſtook the nature of ſeverity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it ſelf: they alſo were ignorant that it ought to be uſed for the help, and not for the harm of ſubjects. For what is the ſtrength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters have ever laſted long, but thoſe which have been twiſted and forged by love onely? His witleſs paraſites could well judge of the Kings diſpoſition: and being well learned therein though ignorant in all things elſe, it ſufficed and enabled them ſufficiently for the places they held. But this anſwer of Rehoboam did not a little advance Jeroboams deſigns. For being foretold by the Prophet Achiah of his future advancement, theſe the Kings threats (changing the peoples love into fury) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes, For he was no ſooner arrived, than elected King of Iſrael: the people cryed out, 2 Sam 5. 1. What portion have we in David? wee have no inheritance in the Son of Iſhai. Now though themſelves, even all the Tribes of Iſrael, had conſented to Davids anointing at Hebron the ſecond time, acknowledgeing that they were his bones and his fleſh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgat both the bands of nature, and their duty to God; and, as all alienate reſolved hearts do, they ſerved themſelves for the preſent, with impudent excuſes. And now over-late, and after-time, Rehoboam ſent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man moſt hateful to all his Subjects, to pacify them: whom they inſtantly beat to death with ſtones. Whereupon the King affrighted, 1 King 12. 21. got him from Sichem with all ſpeed, and recovered Jeruſalem, where preparing to invade Iſrael, with an hundred and fourſcore thouſand choſen men, Shimei in the perſon of God commanding to the contrary, all was ſtayed for the preſent. In the mean time Jeroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this ſide, and Penuel on the other ſide of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exerciſe of one Religion would alſo joyn the peoples hearts again to the Houſe of David, and having in all likelihood alſo promiſed the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, he ſet up two Calves of gold for the children of Iſrael to worſhip, impiouſly perſwading them that thoſe were the Gods, or at leaſt by theſe he repreſented thoſe Gods which delivered them out of Egypt, and refuſing the ſervice of the Levites, he made Prieſts fit for ſuch gods. It muſt needs be that by baniſhing the Levites which ſerved David and Solomon through all Iſrael, Jeroboam greatly enriched himſelf: as taking into his hands all thoſe Cities which were given them by Moſes and Joſhua, for as it is written, The Levites left their ſuburbs, and their poſſeſſion, and came to Juda. &c. This irreligious policy of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that never could be rooted out, untill Iſrael for it was rooted out of the Land) was by Prophecy and Miracles impugned ſufficiently when it firſt began; but the affections maintaining it, were ſo ſtrong, that neither Prophecy nor Miracle could make them yeild. Jeroboam could not 1 King. 13. 4. be moved now by the Authority of Ahia, who from the Lord had firſt promiſed unto him the Kingdom; nor by the withering of his own hand as he ſtretched it over the Altar, which alſo clave aſunder according to the ſign, which the man of God had given him by the commandment of God, who again recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obſtinate Verſe 5. an Idolater as before, for he held it the ſafeſt Verſe 6. courſe in policy to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Jeroboam, who forſook God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Miniſters taught them, was by a modern Hiſtorian compared with the policies of late Ages; obſerving well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian born. Sic qui hodiè (ſaith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda præſenteſq; utilitates ſibi tanquam ultimum finem conſtituunt, cauſam quam vocant ſtatus in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipſa tuenda, promovenda, conſervanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si injuria proximo irroganda ſi juſtitiæ honeſtatiſq; leges ſubvertendæ. ſi religio ipſa peſſundanda ſi deniq; omnia jura divina & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per fas nefaſq; relinquendum cenſent; cuncta ruant, omnia pereant, nihil ad ipſos, modo id, quod è re ſua eſſe ſibi perſuadent, obtineant, ac ſi nullus ſit qui talia curet, caſtigareve poſſit Deus: So they who are now called called Polititians, propounding to themselves, as their utmost end and scope, their own commodity and present profit, are wont to alledge the case of state forsooth, as the principal point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for advancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they think that they may do any thing. If they mean to oppress their neighbour, to overturn all laws of justice and honesty, if Religion it self must go to wrack, yea, if all rights of God and man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will do any thing; let all go to ruine what care they, so long as they may have what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of raggione del stato, did serve as well to uphold, as at the Amos 7. 13 first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amazia the Priest of Bethel counselled the Pro-

It was reason of state that perswaded the last French King Henry the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsook, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizor of wise proceeding delude even those that know the foul face of impiety lurking under it: and behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it, whereof Jehu, and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselves very great examples.

§. II.

Of Rehoboam his impiety; for which he was punished by Sesac: of his end, and Contemporaries.

WHile Jeroboam was occupied in setting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, having now little hope to recover the Provinces lost, strengthened the principal places remaining with all endeavour; for he fortified and victualled fif-
2 Chro. 11. teen Cities of Juda and Benjamin: not that he feared Jeroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Jeroboam had not only fastned himself, but withall invited them to invade Judæa: laying perchance before them the uncountable Riches of David and Salomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judæans. So as by those two waies (of late years often trodden) to wit, change of Religion, and invitation of forraign force, Jeroboam hoped to settle himself in the seat of Israel, whom yet the powerful God for his Idolatry in few years after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam ha- 1 Kings 14 13.
ving also, as he thought, by fortifying divers places, assured his estate, forsook the law of the living God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves, on every high Hill, and under every green Tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his reign, 2 Chro. 12. 3.
Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom, as well Adad of Idumæa, as Jeroboam, were familiar, and his instruments; entred Judæa with twelve thousand Chariots, and threescore thousand Jos. Ant. 8. c. 4.
Horse, besides Foot-men, which Josephus numbers at four hundred thousand. This Army was compounded of four Nations: Egyptians, Lubæans, Succæans, and Cusites. The Lubæans were Lybæans the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West side. The Lubæans were of Petræa, and of the desart Arabia which afterwards followed Zera against Asa King of Juda. The Succæans according 2 Chro 12. 2 King. 14 were the Troglodita, mentioned often in Pliny, Ptolemy, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not far from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about six hundred English miles from the best & Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I do not think that the Succims or Succæi were those Troglodita, but rather those Ca. 47. v. 13.

Arabians which Ptolemy calls Arabes Ægyptii, Ichthyophagy, which possess that part of Egypt behind the mountains called Alabastrini, and the red Sea, far nearer Egypt and readier to be levied than those removed Savages of the Troglodita.

With this great and powerful Army, Sesac invaded Judæa, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Jerusalem it self, of which and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoyle, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadezer, in the Syrian war: these Rehoboam supplyed with Targets of brass, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality, whom Syracides calleth, The foolishness of the people.

From this time forward the King of Egypt claimed the soveraignty of Judæa, and held the Jews as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seems, rendring up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the word of God, where premising the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt, in these words, Nevertheless they (to wit, the Judæans) shall be his servants, that is, the servants of Sesac.

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve years, and his losses received by Sesac, notwithstanding, he continued the war against Jeroboam all his life time. After his death Jeroboam governed Israel four years, Rehoboam lived 58. years, and reigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemejah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

Over the Latines reigned Silvius Alba Silvius Atys, the fourth and the fift of the Silvii.

Euseb. Chron.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastrartus King of Tire was murthered by his Nurses sons, or foster-brethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdom twelve years.

Toward his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, began to govern Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Astartus, the son of Balcastartus, recovered the Kingdom of Tyre from the Usurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battel between Jeroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods judgments.

Abijah the son of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdom, and his vices. He raised an Army of four hundred thousand, with which he invaded Jeroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies joyned near to the Mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrown, and the strength of Israel broken: for there fell of that side five hundred thousand; the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recovered Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron. Soon after which discomfiture, Jeroboam died: who reigned in all 22. years, Abijah, the better to strengthen himself, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria, as may be gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he reigned but three years, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet as some part of his Fathers were.

2 Chro. 16. 23.

Here we see how it pleased God to punish the sins of Salomon in his son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traytor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he served God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when he forsook him, it was torn asunder by his meanest Vassals. Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sesac; For the son Abijah was able to leavy four hundred thousand men, and with the same number he overthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them five hundred thousand; God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were expresst, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their people; the same being both before, and at the instant delivered by Prophets: so the same just God, who liveth and governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give victory, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw down Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwaies the causes are set down, that they might be as presidents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in David's time for three years, For Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrows in effect, for Uriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelve torn from his son for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoiled of his Riches and Honour by Sesac of Egypt, because the people of Juda made Images, High places, and Groves, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Jeroboam was punished in himself and his posterity, for the golden Calves that he erected. Joram had all his sons slain by the Philistims, and his very bowels torn out of his body by an excoriating flix, for murthering his brethren. Ahab and Jezabel were slain, the blood of one, the body of the other eaten with dogs, for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same, and the like sins in all after-times, and in these our daies by the same famine, plagues, war, loss, vexation, death, sickness and calamities; howsoever the wise men of the World raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and eares, seem to them to work every alteration that happeneth.

§. IV.
Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

2 Chro 14. TO Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten years, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking down the alters dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting 1 Chro. 15. 16. down their groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his own mother, who was an Idolatress, but deposing her from her regency, brake her Idol, stampt it, and burnt it. He also fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the troubles of war in the leasure of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judæa, and with such a multitude entred the territory of Asa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never assembled of that Nation, either before or since: 2 Chro. 14. 9. For it is written, that there came against the Judæans, Zerah of Æthiopia, with an host of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountered with an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand levyed out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, which obeyed him, and with which he overthrew this fearful multitude, and had the spoyle both of their Cities and Camps.

That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian, I have * proved already, and were it but the length between Æthiopia and Judæa, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt interjacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is, that these invaders were Æthiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoyled by the Judæans, in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Besor, which David past over when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proveth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier town stan- 2 Chro. 14 ding on the uttermost South-border of all Judæa, from all parts of Æthiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoyles which Asa took as the cattel, camels, and sheep, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoyning, and not far off, and not unknown Æthiopians. And if it be objected that these desart countries can hardly yeild a million of men fit for the wars. I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petræa. and the Desart, which compass two parts of the holy Land, should yeild ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arm five hundred and fourscore thousand. Besides, it answered to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that he would make him fruitful, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Baasha a King of Israel began to reign in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, 2 Chr 16. v. 1. to joyn with him against Asa; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Jerusalem toward Samaria.

This war began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. year of Asa his reign: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. year of Asa; therefore could not Baasha begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reign, but in the 35. year of the division of Juda and Israel, for so many years it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. years, to the 16. of Asa. It may seem strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand good Souldiers, did not easily drive away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Jeroboam, and of Asa himself against Zerah, being yet fresh in mind, which might well have emboldened the men of Juda, and asmuch disheartened the enemies. Questionless there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the imployment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late service against Zerah, had caused many mens private businesses to lye undispatched, where by the people being now intentive to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be unwilling to stir against the Israelites, choosing rather to wink at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardness of the people might have deterred Asa from adventuring himself with the least part of his forces, and committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose employments Benhadad hadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baaſha. For the Iſraelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himſelf (after his invaſion) nor his ſucceſſors after him ever gave over, till they had made themſelves maſters of that Kingdom. So Benhadad being now entred into Nepthalim, without reſiſtance, he ſpoiled di-

1 King 15 brought thither, to fortifie the ſame: which done, Benhadad, who loved neither party, being loden with the ſpoiles of Iſrael, and the treaſures of Juda, returned to Damaſcus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Aſa, in that he now relyed on the ſtrength of Syria, and did not reſt himſelf on the favour and aſſiſtance of God, he not only cauſed Hanani to be impriſoned, but he began to burden and oppreſs his people, and was therefore ſtrucken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feet, wherewith af-

There lived with Aſa, Ageſilaus the ſixt of the Heraclidæ, and Bacis the fift King of the ſame race in Corinth, of whom his ſucceſſors were afterward called Bacidæ. Aſtartus, and Aſtarimus were Kings in Tyre. Aſtarimus took revenge on his brother Phelletes, for

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reign of Aſa.

IN the reign of Aſa the Kingdom of Iſrael felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten Tribes unto their former allegeance to the houſe of David, if the wiſdom of God had not otherwiſe determined. The wickedneſs of Jeroboam had, in his later daies, the ſentence of heavy vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the ſame Prophet which had foretold the diviſion of Iſrael, for the ſin of Salomon, and his reign over the ten Tribes. One ſon Jeroboam had among others, in whom only God found ſo much piety, as (though it ſufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured unto him a peaceable end; an honourable teſtimony of the peoples love, by their general mourning and lamentation at his death; and (wherein he was moſt happy) the favourable approbation of God himſelf.

After the loſs of this good ſon, the ungodly father was ſoon taken away: a miſerable creature, ſo conſcious of his vile unthankfulneſs to God, that he durſt not ſuffer his own name to be uſed in conſulting with an holy Prophet, aſſured of the ruine hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extream hatred; yet forbearing to deſtroy thoſe accurſed Idols that wrought his confuſion. So loath he was to forſake his worldly wiſdom, when the world was ready to forſake him, and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam, reigned in the ſecond and third years of Aſa, which are reckoned as two years, though indeed his fathers laſt year of two and twenty did run along (how far is uncertain) with the ſecond of Aſa, whoſe third year was the firſt of Baa- 1 King 15. ſha, ſo that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not 25. his Kingdom one whole year. He did not alter his fathers courſes, neither did God alter his ſentence. It ſeems that he little feared the judgements denounced againſt his fathers houſe: for as a Prince that was ſecure of his own eſtate, he armed all Iſrael againſt the Philiſtims, and beſieged one of their Towns. There (whether it were ſo, that the people were offended with his ill ſucceſs, and recalled to mind their grievous loſs of five hundred thouſand under Jeroboam, counting it an unlucky family to the Nation; or whether by ſome particular indiſcretion, he exaſperated them) ſlain he was by Baaſha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his ſtead. Baaſha was no ſooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the houſe of Jeroboam, that none of them might moleſt him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the ſword. That he did this for private reſpects, and not in regard of Gods will to have it ſo, it is evident by his continuing in the ſame form of Idolatry which Jeroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the ſame ſentence from God that had been laid upon Jeroboam; which was executed upon him alſo in the ſame ſort. He began to infeſt Aſa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waſt his Country, deſtroying all the Land of Nepthalim. Four and twenty years he reigned, and then dying, left the Crown to Ela his ſon; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam had done, two years current, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous perſon. He ſent an Army againſt Gibbethon, the ſame town of the Philiſtims, before which Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam periſhed; but he ſate at home the whilſt, feaſting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gave ſuch advantage againſt himſelf, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Maſter ſo diſſolute, and his behaviour ſo contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baaſha had found, by doing as Baaſha had done. Wherefore he did ſet upon Ela in his drunkenneſs, and ſlew him. Preſently upon which fact, he ſtiled himſelf King of Iſrael: and began his reign with maſſacring all the houſe of Baaſha; extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolk, but unto all his friends in Terza. Theſe news were quickly blown to the Camp at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in ſtead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they ſaluted King, they (quitting the ſiege of Gibbethon) preſented themſelves before Tirza; which in ſhort ſpace they may ſeem to have forced. Zimri wanting ſtrength to defend the City, not courage to keep himſelf from falling alive into his enemies hands, did ſet fire on the Palace, conſuming it and himſelf together to aſhes. Seven daies he is ſaid to have reigned: accounting (as is moſt likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Camp. For Zimri was alſo an Idolater, Walking in the way of Jeroboam; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himſelf, than the reign of ſeven daies, and thoſe conſumed partly in murthering the friends of Baaſha, partly in ſeeking to have defended his own life. After the death of Ela, there aroſe another King to oppoſe the faction of Omri; whereby it may ſeem, that Zimri had made his party ſtrong, as being able to ſet up a new head, who doubtleſs would never have appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, ſome ſtrength, not unlikely to reſiſt and vanquiſh the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new competitor of Omri, held out, I do not find; onely it appears that his ſide was decayed, and ſo he died, leaving no other Succeſſor than his concurrent.

1 King. 16. 19.

§. VI.

A conjecture of the cauſes hindering the re-union of Iſrael with Juda, which might have been effected by theſe troubles.

ANy man that ſhall conſider the ſtate of Iſrael in thoſe times, may juſtly wonder how it came to paſs, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already ſuffered under theſe unfortunate Princes, and with the preſent civil wars, did not return to their ancient Kings, and re-unite themſelves with the mighty Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppreſſed factions, did not call in Aſa, but rather choſe the one to endure a deſperate neceſſity of yeilding, or burning himſelf, the other to languiſh away as a man forſaken; than to have recourſe unto a remedy, ſo ſure, ſo ready, and ſo honourable. To ſay that GOD was pleaſed to have it ſo, were a true, but an idle anſwer (for his ſecret will is the cauſe of all things) unleſs it could be proved; that he had forbidden Aſa to deal in that buſineſs, as he forbad Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the reſtraint laid by God upon Rehoboam, did only bind his hands from attempting the ſuppreſſion of that preſent inſurrection, it appears by the War continued between Iſrael and Juda, ſo many years following: wherein Abia ſo far prevailed, that he wan a great battail, and recovered ſome Towns belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the ſecond cauſes moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to ſuffer any thing under new upſtarts, rather than to caſt their eyes upon that Royal houſe of David, from which the ſucceſſion of five Kings in lineal deſcent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omri had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Aſa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worſe than all that were before him; which as it might ſerve alone to prove, that Aſa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, ſo the courſe which he profeſſed to take at the very firſt, of revenging the maſſacre committed upon the famly and friends of Baaſha (Aſa his mortal enemy) gives manifeſt reaſon, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, ſhould ſhould more juſtly than he have expected the friendſhip of Juda in that quarrel. Wherefore in ſearching out the reaſon of this backwardneſs in the ten Tribes (which was ſuch, that they may ſeem to have never thought upon the matter) to ſubmit themſelves to their true Princes; it were not amiſs to examine the cauſes moving the people to revenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard rather than of Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam, who followed the Wars in perſon, as a man of ſpirit and courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very firſt defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we look upon humane reaſon) occaſioned by deſire of breaking that heavy yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their necks. Their deſire was to have a King that ſhould not oppreſs them; not to have no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had cauſed them to renounce him, they did immediatly chooſe Jeroboam in his ſtead, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto them, for which he had contended in their behalf. Neither were they (as it ſeems) herein altogether deceived. For his affectation of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towers, and in the inſtitution of his new deviſed Idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them to travel ſo far as to Jeruſalem. But whether it were ſo, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to ceaſe, towards the latter end of his reign, and in the reign of his ſon, when long time of poſſeſſion had confirmed his title, which at the firſt was only good by courteſie of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in ſuch caſes) were more offended by ſome prerogatives of a King, that he ſtill retained in his own hands, than pleaſed with his remiſſion of other burdens, it is clearly apparent, that the whole Army of all Iſrael joyned with Baaſha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Jeroboams houſe.

Now the reign of Baaſha himſelf, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and coſt at Rama was caſt away; the other ſide of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one Town of Gibbethon from the Philiſtims, but left that buſineſs to his ſon, who likewiſe appears an unprofitable ſluggard. Wherefore it muſt needs be, that the favour of the people toward the houſe of Baaſha grew from his good form of Civil Government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to do. And ſurely he that ſhall take pains to look into thoſe examples which are extant of the different courſes, held by the Kings of Iſrael and Juda, in adminiſtration of juſtice, will find it moſt probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued ſo averſe from the line of David; as to think all adverſity more tolerable, than the weighty Scepter of that houſe. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeed by them deſerved; yet in that they ſuffered it without form of judgment, they ſuffered like unto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgment, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings jealouſie: out of which by the ſame rule of arbitrary juſtice (under which it may be ſuppoſed that many were caſt away) he would have ſlain Jeroboam (if he could have caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appears by his confident return out of Egypt, like one that was known to have endured wrong, having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Jehoram did upon his brethren, and upon ſundry of his greateſt men; as alſo Joaſh did ſo put to death Zachariah the ſon of Jehojada, who had made him King, even in the court of the houſe of the Lord: and Manaſſes did ſhed innocent blond exceeding much, till he repleniſhed Jeruſalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; beſides his ſin, wherewith he made Juda to ſin. Contrariwiſe, among the Kings of Iſrael we find no monument of ſuch arbitrary proceeding, unleſs perhaps the words of Jehoram the ſon of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an inſtance, when he ſaid, God do ſo to me, and more alſo, if the head of Eliſha the ſon of Shaphat ſhall ſtand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether he meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a falſe Prophet, that had made them hold out againſt the Aramites, till they were fain to eat their own children; which he thought a ſufficient argument to prove, that it was not Gods purpoſe to deliver them. The death of Naboth ſheweth rather the liberty which the Iſraelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not fear to ſtand upon his own right, though Ahab were even ſick for anger; neither was he for that cauſe put to death, as upon commandement, but made away by conſpiracy, the matter being handled after a judicial form, which might give ſatisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

2 Chro. 24. 21.

2 King. 21. 16.

2 King. 6. 31.

The murther of the Prophets is continually aſcribed to Jezabel, an impudent Woman, and not unto the King her husband. Neither is it certain, that there was no Law made whereby their lives were taken from them; but certain it is, that the people being Idolaters, were both pleaſed with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (ſuch as are regiſtred) prove them to uſe a more abſolute maner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither do their ſufferings witneſs the contrary. For of thoſe which reigned over Juda, from the diviſion of the Kingdom, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were ſlain by the people, and two were denied a burial amongſt their Anceſtors. Yea, the death of Ahazia and his brethren, ſlain by Jehu, with the deſtruction of all that Royal ſeed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) ſtir up in the people any ſuch thirſt of revenge, as might by the ſuddenneſs and uniformity teſtifie the affection to be general, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes: unleſs we ſhould think that the death of Athalia, after ſeven years reign, were occaſioned rather by the memory of her ill purchaſing, than by the preſent ſenſe of her tyrannical abuſing the government, whereon ſhe had ſeiſed. On the other ſide, ſuch of the Kings of Iſrael as periſhed by treaſon (which were ſeven of the twenty) were all ſlain by conſpiracy of the great men, who aſpired by treaſon to the Crown: the people being ſo far from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Soveraigns, that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good ſucceſs of treaſon, unleſs fear compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traiterouſly got and uſurped, for a little while, their places; only three of the ſeven remain, whoſe ends how the people took, it may be doubtful. Though indeed it is preciſely ſaid of the ſlaughter committed on Ahab's children by Jehu, that the people durſt not fight with him that did it, becauſe they were exceedingly affraid: and the ſame fear might be in them at the death of Peka, whoſe Hiſtory (as others of that time) is curſorily paſſed over. The like may be pronounced, and more abſolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of them periſhed by fury of the people, but by treaſon of ſuch as did ſucceed them; neither was there any motive urging ſo forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in priſon, as fear leſt the people ſhould ſtir in their quarrel. And certainly (howſoever all that the Law cals treaſon, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings deſtruction) in thoſe treaſonable inſurrections of the vulgar, which have here moſt prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it ſelf with the bloud of ſome great Officers; no ſuch rebellions, howſoever wicked and barbarous otherwiſe, thirſting after the ruine of their natural Soveraign, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royal perſon: which if any man impute unto groſs ignorance, another may more charitably, and I think, more truely, aſcribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that Fable of Briareus, who, being looſened by Pallas, did with his 100. hands give aſſiſtance to Jupiter, when all the reſt of the gods conſpired againſt him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as ſignifying that Monarchies need not to fear any curbing of their abſoluteneſs by mighty ſubjects, as long as by wiſedom they keep the hearts of the people, who will be ſure to come in on their ſide. Though indeed the Story might very well have born the ſame interpretation, as it is rehearſed by Homer, who tels us that Pallas was one of the conſpiracy, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by looſening Briareus. For a good Form of Government ſufficeth by it ſelf to retain the people, not only without aſſiſtance of a laborious Wit, but even againſt all devices of the greateſt and ſhrewdeſt Politicians: every Sheriffe and Conſtable, being ſooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalf, than any over-weening Rebel, how mighty ſoever, can againſt him.

2 King 9 10.

2 King 10 4.

This declaration of the peoples love, being ſeldome found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it ſelf of government there was ſuch, as neither gave occaſion of contentment unto the ſubjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which reaſons it may ſeem that the multitude was kept uſually diſarmed. For otherwiſe it would have been almoſt impoſſible, that Athalia the ſiſter of Ahab, a ſtranger to the Royal bloud of Juda, ſhould by the only authority of a Queen-mother have deſtroyed all the ſeed of David, and uſurped the Kingdome very near 7. years, without finding any reſiſtance. Yea when Jehojada the high Prieſt had agreed with the Captains and principal men of the Land to ſet up Joaſh their lawful King, whereunto the whole Nation were generally well affected, he was fain to give to theſe Captains and their men, the ſpears and the ſhields that were King Davids, and were in the houſe of the Lord. But we need not enter into ſuch particulars.

Queſti-

Queſtionleſs, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their own choice or admiſſion, holding the Crown by a more uncertain tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reaſon, why the ten Tribes did never ſeek to return to their ancient Lords: but after the deſtruction of their ſix firſt Kings, which died in the reign of Aſa, admitted a ſeventh of a new Family, rather than they would conſubject themſelves with thoſe of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavy yoke.

So Aſa having ſeen the death of 7. Kings of Iſrael, died himſelf after one and forty years reign, leaving Jehoſaphat his ſon to deal with Ahab the ſon of Omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

Of Jehoſaphat and his contemporaries.

Jehoſaphat, who ſucceeded Aſa, was a Prince religious and happy, he deſtroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to Idolatry, and ſent Teachers to all places and people wanting inſtruction; he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philiſtims: from the one he had ſilver, from the other ſheep and goats to the number of fifteen thouſand and four hundred. The numbers of men of War were more than admirable; for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thouſand, Jehohanam of two hundred and 2 Chro. 17. fourſcore thouſand, and Amaſia of two hundred thouſand; alſo that he had, beſides theſe in Benjamin, of thoſe that bare ſhields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers under Eliada, two hundred thouſand, and under the commandement of Jehozabad a hundred and fourſcore thouſand: which numbred together make eleven hundred and ſixty thouſand, all which are ſaid to have waited upon the King, beſides his Garriſons.

That Juda and Benjamin, a Territory not much exceeding the County of Kent, ſhould muſter eleven hundred and ſixty thouſand fighting men, it is very ſtrange, and the number far greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in David's time found five hundred thouſand: Rehoboam found 2 Sam. 24. 4. but an hundred and fourſcore thouſand: Abia four hundred and eight thouſand: Aſa five hundred and fourſcore thouſand: Amazia inrolled all that could bear arms, and they amounted to three hundred thouſand. Surely, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehoſaphat that Moab and Ammon were entred his Territory to the Weſt of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would have feared even the Army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field 11. hundred and 60. thouſand fighting men, leaving all his ſtrong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my ſelf to better judgment) that theſe numbers ſpecified in the ſecond of Chronicles the 17. diſtributed to ſeveral Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thouſand under Adnah, and the 200. and fourſcore thouſand under Jehohanam, were afterward commanded and muſtered by Amaſiah, Eliad, and Jehoſabad: for the groſs and total is not in that place ſet down, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Again, as the aids which Jehoſaphat brought to Ahab did not ſhew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, ſo the Moabites and Ammonites which he feared, could never make the one half of thoſe numbers, which he that commanded leaſt among Jehoſaphat's Leaders had under him.

This mighty Prince, notwithſtanding his greatneſs, yet he joyned in friendſhip with Ahab King of Iſrael, who had married that wicked Woman Jezabel. Him Jehoſaphat viſited at Samaria, and cauſed his ſon Joram to marry Athalia, this Achab's Daughter.

Ahab perſwaded Jehoſaphat to aſſiſt him in the War againſt the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together four hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites, to fore-tel the ſucceſs: who promiſed him Victory. But Jehoſaphat believed nothing at all in thoſe diviners, but reſolved firſt of all to conferre with ſome one Prophet of the Lord God of Iſrael. Hereupon Achab made anſwer that he had one called Michaiah, but he hated that Prophet, becauſe he alwayes fore-told of evil, and never of any good towards him. Yet Michaiah was ſent for to the King; but by the way the meſſenger prayed him to conſent with the reſt of the Prophets, and to promiſe Victory unto them, as they did. But Michaiah ſpake the truth, and repeated his Viſion to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who ſhall perſwade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a ſpirit that ſtood before the Lord anſwered, that he would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a falſe ſpirit to delude. For as it is ſaid by Chriſt: Non enim vos eſtis qui loquimini, ſed ſpiritus patris veſtri ſtri loquitur in vobis. It is not you that ſpeak, but the Spirit of your Father ſpeaks in you: ſo in a contrary kind did the devil in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his deſtruction. And as P. Martyr upon this place well obſerveth, theſe evil ſpirits are miniſters of Gods vengeance, and are uſed as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes ſometime imploy, For as it pleaſeth God by his good Angels, to ſave and deliver from deſtruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: ſo on the contrary, it is by the evil that he puniſheth and deſtroyeth; both which are ſaid to perform the Will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Eccleſiaſticus remembreth a ſecond ſort of malignant natures, but they are everywhere viſible. There are ſpirits, ſaith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on ſure ſtrokes. In the time of deſtruction they ſhew forth their power, and accompliſh the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias having by this his revelation greatly diſpleaſed the King, and the Prophets, whoſe ſpirit he diſcovered, was ſtroken by Zidkiah one of Baal's Prophets, and by Achab himſelf committed to priſon: where he appointed him to be reſerved and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiah, not fearing to reply, anſwered, If thou return in peace, the Lord hath not ſpoken by me. Nevertheleſs Achab went on in that War, and was wounded to death. Jehoſaphat returned to Jeruſalem, where he was reprehended by Jehu the Prophet for aſſiſting an idolatrous Prince, and 2 Chro. 18. one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damaſcens, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumæans to invade Judæa: who paſs Jordan and encamp at Engaddi; and when Jehoſaphat gathered his Army, the Prophet Jahaziel fore-told him of the Victory, which ſhould be obtained without any bloud-ſhed of his part: and ſo when Jehoſaphat approached, this Aſſembly of Nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, diſagreeing with the Idumæans, and quarrelling for ſome cauſes among themſelves, thoſe of Ammon and Moab ſet up-2 Chro. 20. on the Idumæans, and brake them utterly: which done, they alſo invaded each other; in which broil Jehoſaphat arriving, took the ſpoil of them all without any loſs of his part, as it was fore-told and promiſed by God. Notwithſtanding this Victory, Jehoſaphat, forgeting that he was formerly reprehended for aſſiſting an idolatrous King, did notwithſtanding joyn with Ochazias, the ſon of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to ſend to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eleizer the Prophet fore-told him, his ſhips periſhed, and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and ſo that enter- 2 Chro. 20.
prize was overthrown.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram, the brother of Ochazias, againſt the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda and Iſrael, the Edomites joyn their Forces, not forgetting, it ſeems, that the Moabites, aſſiſted by the Ammonites, had not long before deſtroyed their Army.

The Moabites, ſubjects to David and Salomon, forſaking the Kings of Juda, gave themſelves for vaſſals to Jeroboam, and ſo they continued to his ſucceſſors till the death of Achab: but Jehoſaphat, notwithſtanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it ſeemeth he was drawn into this War, both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Iſrael, as alſo becauſe they had lately joyned themſelves with the Syrians againſt Joſaphat, and thirdly, to puniſh their double rebellion who firſt forſook Juda, and now Iſrael.

Both Kings reſolved to paſs by the way of Idumæa, thereby the better to aſſure that Nation; for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi againſt Jehoſaphat: But whether they had then declared themſelves againſt Jehoſaphat, it is not certain; for in the 2. of Chron. 21. verſ. 8. it is written, that in the time of Jehoram the ſon of Jehoſaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it ſeemeth to me that the Edomites, when they were ſlain by Moab and Ammon, not finding themſelves ſatisfied in ſuch conditions as they required, offered to return from them, and to joyn themſelves with the Army of Juda. For, that they were numbred among the enemies of Jehoſaphat, it is plain in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 21. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehoſaphat's death. Now in the paſſage of theſe Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumæans having a purpoſe to rebel, miſled the Army of Juda and Iſrael, with intent to infeeble them for want of Water; true it is, that they ſuffered the ſame, if not a greater thirſt than the Armies of Craſſus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had in all likelihood utterly periſhed, had not Eliſha taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water ſprang, by which not only Jehoſaphat and his Army, but Jehoram King of Iſrael an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodneſs of God having ever been prone to ſave the evil for the good, whereas he never deſtroyed the good for the evil.

The miſerable iſſue of this War, and how 2 King. 3.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat, and Ahazia.

§. I.

That Jehoram was made King sundry times.

Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda began to reign at thirty two years of age, and lived until he was forty years old, being eight years a King: but of these eight years, which Jehoram is said to have reigned, four are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian war with Ahab, left this Jehoram King in his stead, as Ahab did his son Ahazia. This appears by the several beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the 1 Kin. 22. v. 51. two Jehorams Kings of Israel and Juda, and to Ahazia the eldest son of Ahab. For Ahazia is said to have begun his reign, in the seventeenth year of Jehosaphat. Jehoram the brother of Ahazia succeeded him in the 2. year
2 Kin. 1. 17 of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda; that is, in the next year after that Jehoram of
2 King. 3. v. 1. & 9. Juda was designed King by his father; it being (as we find elsewhere) the eighteenth year of Jehosaphat himself, who went with the Israelites against Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royal office was retained still by Jehosaphat, who governed absolutely by himself, not communicating the rule with his son. But in the fifth
2 King. 8. 16. year of Jehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Jehosaphat, the old King took unto him, as partner in the government, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32. years old, his father being 57. Now
2 Kin. 22. 42. forasmuch as Jehosaphat reigned 25. years, it is evident that his son did not reign alone till the eighth of Joram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Israel, who did not alwaies reign precisely so long as the bare letter of the Text may seem at first to affirm: but their years were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the years of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing less needful than curious, to enquire into the reasons moving Jehosaphat either to assume unto him his son as partner in the Kingdom, whilst he was able himself to command both in peace and in war, the like having never been done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the 17. of his reign) vouchsafed unto him that honor, to resume it to himself, or at least wise to defer the confirmation of it, until four or five years were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a mean to find some light, whereby we may more clearly discover the causes of much extraordinary business ensuing, I hold it not amiss to make such conjecture, as the circumstances of the story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seem to approve.

We are therefore to consider, that this King Jehosaphat was the first of Rehoboams issue that ever entred into any streight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themselves in vain, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Jehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive and defensive between Israel and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

This confederacy made by a religious King, 2 Chro. 19. v. 2. & 3. with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountain of all wisdom: yet as a piece of sound policy, doubtless it wanted not fair pretences of much common good thereby likely to ariſe, with mutual fortification of both thoſe Kingdoms, againſt the uncircumciſed Nations their ancient enemies. This apparent benefit, being ſo ineſtimable a jewell, that it might not eaſily be loſt, but continue as hereditary from father to ſon, it was thought a very good courſe to have it confirmed by ſome ſure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri, and ſiſter of Ahab King of Iſrael, given in marriage to Jehoram, who was ſon and heir apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a maſculine ſpirit, and had learned ſo much of Queen Jezabel her brothers wife, that ſhe durſt undertake, and could throughly perform a great deal more in Jeruſalem, than the other knew how to compaſs in Samaria. She was indeed a fire-brand ordained by God to conſume a great part of the nobleſt houſes in Juda, and perhaps of thoſe men or their children, whoſe worldly wiſdom, regardleſs of Gods pleaſure, had brought her in.

The firſt fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Iſrael did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory ſhould have redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very ſeldom thrive by matching with Idolaters, but rather ſerve the turns of thoſe falſe friends, who being ill affected to God himſelf cannot be well affected to his ſervants. Before their ſetting forth, Ahab deſigned, as King, his ſon Ahaziah; not ſo much perhaps in regard of the uncertain events of war (for none of his predeceſſors had ever done the like, upon the like occaſions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the prophet Michaia (for he deſpiſed them) as inviting Jehoſaphat by his own example, to take the ſame courſe, wherein he prevailed.

§. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old king Jehoſaphat to change his purpoſe often, in making his ſon Jehoram King.

MAny arguments do very ſtrongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his wife, eſpecially for his forſaking the religion of his godly Anceſtors, and following the abominable ſuperſtitions of the houſe of Achab.

That ſhe was a woman of intollerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole courſe of her actions witneſſeth at large. Much vain matter ſhe was able to produce, whereby to make her husband think that his brethren and kindred were but mean and unworthy perſons in compariſon of him, and of his children, which were begotten upon the daughter and ſiſter of two great Kings, not upon baſe women, and meer ſubjects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained againſt the Syrian Benhadad were matter ſufficient to make an inſolent man think highly of himſelf, as being allied ſo honourably, who could otherwiſe have found in his heart well enough, to deſpiſe all his brethren, as being the eldeſt, and heir apparent to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the poſſeſſion.

How ſoon his vices brake out, or how long he diſſembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that ſome ſmoke, out of the hidden fire, did very ſoon make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon cauſed the young man to know himſelf better, by making him fall back into rank among his younger brethren. And ſurely the doings of Jehoſaphat about the ſame time, argue no ſmal diſtemper of the whole country, through the miſgovernment of his ungodly ſon. For the good King was fain to make his progreſs round about the Land, reclaiming the people unto the ſervice of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the ſtrong Cities of Juda City by City. This had been a needleſs labour, if the religion taught & ſtrongly maintained by Aſa, and by himſelf, had not ſuffered alteration, and the courſe of Juſtice been perverted, by the power of ſuch as had born authority. But the neceſſity that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give to the Judges; and by his commiſſion given to one of the Prieſts in ſpiritual cauſes, and to the Steward of his houſe in temporal matters, to be generall over-ſeers. 2 Chro. 19. v. 4, 5, &c.

This was not till after the death of Ahazia the ſon of Ahab; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Ahazia began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoſaphat, which was then accounted the ſecond of Jehoram, Jehoſaphat's ſon, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another firſt and ſecond year, even in his fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the beſt Chronologers and Expoſitors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in private eſtate, uutil the two and twentieth of his fathers reign, at which time, though the occaſions inducing his reſtitution to former dignity are not ſet down, yet we may not think, that motives thereto, appearing ſubſtantial, were wanting. Jehoram of Iſrael held the ſame correſpondency with with Jehoſaphat that his father had done; and made uſe of it. He drew the Judæans into the war of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or if we ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize againſt Moab did not occupy ſo much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoſaphat, in which year that Nation rebelled againſt Iſrael, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations between the two Kings of Juda and Iſrael, and the affinity between them contracted in the perſon of Jehoram, might offer ſome good occaſions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger ſons, in their elder brothers diſgrace, might cauſe their father to put him in poſſeſſion for fear of tumult after his death; or the deep diſſimulation of Jehoram himſelf might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethen; it being a thing uſual in miſchievous fell natures, to be as abject and ſervile in time of adverſity, as inſolent and bloody upon advantage. This is manifeſt, that being repoſſeſſed of his former eſtate, he demeaned himſelf in ſuch wiſe toward his brethren, as cauſed their father to enable them, not only with ſtore of ſilver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtleſs had uſed unto their younger ſons) but with the cuſtody of ſtrong Cities in Juda, to aſſure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, againſt unwonted perils.

1 Chro. 21. 3.

§. III.

The doings of Jehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BUt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwiſe determined of the ſequel. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the younger ſons of Jehoſaphat found ſtrong Cities, a weak defence, againſt the power of him unto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the ſummons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more adoe; if they ſtood upon their guard, then were they Traytors, and ſo unable to hold out againſt him, who beſides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Iſraelitiſh Kingdom againſt them; ſo that the apparent likelihood of their final overthrow, ſufficed to make all forſake them in the very beginning. Howſoever it was, they were all taken and ſlain, and with them for company many great men of the Land, ſuch belike as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant ſought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Jehoram was depoſed from his government; in which office they, without forbearing to do juſtice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things derogatory to their young Maſter; which if he would now call treaſon, ſaying that he vvas then King, vvho durſt ſay the contrary?

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone to make invaſions in Religion, wherein he vvas not contented, as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and ſafe conduct unto Superſtition and Idolatry, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that ſin, whereto it is wonderful that they were ſo much addicted, having ſuch knowledge of God, and of his deteſting that above all other ſins; but he uſed compulſion, and was (if not the very firſt) the firſt that is regiſtred, to have ſet up Irreligion by force.

Whilſt he was thus buſied at home, in doing what he liſted, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled againſt him abroad; and having hitherto ſince David's time, been governed by a Vice-Roy, did now make unto themſelves a King. Againſt theſe Jehoram in perſon made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots; with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the Rebels to fly into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing ſome of thoſe whom he ſhould have ſubdued, and kept his ſervants. Now began the prophecy of Iſaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Eſau in proceſs of time ſhould break the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their own ſo well, that when, after many civil and forrein wars, the Jews by ſundry Nations had been brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his ſon, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jews, in the decrepit age of Iſrael, and reigned as Kings, even in Jeruſalem it ſelf.

The freedom of the Edomites, though purchaſed ſomewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great City within Juda, which in the time of Joſhua had a peculiar King, to rebel againſt Jehoram, and ſet it ſelf in liberty. Libna ſtood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the aſſiſtance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore ſo unlikely it was to have maintained it self in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken, by their powerful, cruel, and throughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Town, had it offered it self unto him: neither do we read that it sought how to cast it self into a new subjection, but continued a free state. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to do as they did: for it was a Town of the Levites; who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which, being devout men, they might fear to lose by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the ten revolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under Idolaters they must have been without it, whether they lived free, or in subjection. Yet it seems that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to do than suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the general visitation before remembred, wherein Jehosaphat reformed his kingdom, the good old King appointing new Governours, and giving them especial charge to do justice without respect of persons, used these words; The Levites shall be officers before you; Be of good courage, and do it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seems, that he encouraged them against the more powerful, than just proceedings of his son; whom if the Levites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, & make them now to feel, as many Princes of the land had done, his heavy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may justly seem very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Jehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have over-whelmed any one Town, and buried it under the earth, which they might well in one moneth have cast into it with shovels, by ordinary approaches.

1 Chro. 21. 10.

But it seems that of those great numbers which his father could have levied, there were not many which Jehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier loss, to let one Town goe, then to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happiness to be feared than to be loved, are fain themselves to stand in fear of those, by whom they might have been dreadful unto others.

§. IV.

Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

THese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince; a Prophecy in writing was delivered to him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wives, and his own body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruel persecutor of Gods servants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and evil Kings; but were fain to denounce Gods judgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have been sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the daies of Jehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecy in writing behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we read Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be believed than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heaven to St. Giles.

2 Chro 21. 12. 2 King. 1. & 3. 11.

But whosoever was the Authour of this threatning Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecy was as terrible as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Judæa, and took the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of David, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Towns, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small territories, by defensive arms, to which they were were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then, as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Country affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoil in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities, such as were thick set in Juda. True it is, that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then known, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered, that this was when they had learned of the Romans the Art of War; and that the provisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skilful in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it self are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous to passengers, but unable to deal with good Souldiers, as riding stark naked, and rather trusting in the swiftness of their horses than in any other means of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seem to have been, that spoiled Judæa in the time of Jehoram. For their Country was alwayes barren and desart, wanting manual Arts whereby to supply the naturals with furniture: neither are these bands named as chief in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may infer, that one half, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Benjamin under Jehosaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eighty thousand fighting men) had been enough to have driven away far greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people been unable to deal with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealousie, as in Saul's time by the policy of the Philistims.

It may seem that the house of the King which these invaders took, was not his Palace in Jerusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Country, where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sack the City, or spoil the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious booty, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jerusalem it self by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guard too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous: and therefore having done what spoil they could, withdrew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conveigh away.

The slaughter committed by Jehu on the two and forty brethren of Ahazia, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sons, and the cruel massacre wherein all the Royal seed perished (only Joas excepted) under the tyranny of Athalia, following within two years after this invasion of the Philistims and Arabians, make it seem probable, that the sons of Jehoram were not all slain at once, but that rather the first murther began in his own time, and was seconded by many other heavy blows, wherewith his house was incessantly striken, until it was in a manner quite hewed down.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which left him not until his guts fell out, and his wretched soul departed from his miserable carkass. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of burial among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his own son succeeded him in the Kingdom, who was guided by the same spirits that had been his Fathers evil Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous interring of a dead husband. She vvas thinkiug how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatness, to retain her favourites in their authority, and to place about her Son such Counsellours of the house of Ahab, as vvere fittest for her turn. Wherefore she thought it unseasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, vvith a stately funeral of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be laid upon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her self and hers, vvhich it now did concern her to avoid. Such is the quality of vvicked Instigators, having made greedy use of bad imployments, to charge, not only vvith his own vices, but vvith their faults also, the man vvhose evil inclinations their sinister counsels have made worse, vvhen once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fell out indeed in a busie time; vvhen his friend and cousin the Israelite, vvho had the same name, was entangled in a difficult War against the Aramite; and therefore could have no better leasure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her own mind, than he had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to help her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistims; Yea, rather he needed and craved the assistance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither again, unless they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish nevertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous means, confound themselves in the seeming-wise devices of their own folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learn to submit their judgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dictateth unto them. For in such kind of unhappy subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Son; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediatly followeth.

§. V.

Of the reign of Ahazia, and his business with the King of Israel.

OChazias, or Ahazia, the son of Jehoram and Athalia, began his reign over Juda, in the twelfth year of Jehoram the son of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficulty than importance to know it: yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion than that of Torniellus, alledging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his kingdom; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that do give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been young: for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsel, by which he perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his fathers courses. In matter of State he likewise upheld the league made with the house of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill success. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blows: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was fain to adventure his own person, which escaped not unwounded.

The Town being won, was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Israel withdrew himself to the City of Jezrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazia returned to Jerusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scantly one year, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part) when he did make a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would have hindered, and therefore sought every occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vain piece of work so to leave his kingdom, having no other business than by way of complement to go see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certain it is, that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavy judgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet upon the house of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he disposed not onely the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seem to have been accidental, but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing less than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtless was one; whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needful, for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Family was destroyed by Jehu.

THe whole Army of Israel, with all the principal Captains, lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captains that were sitting together; who calling out among them Jehu, a principal man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Israel, rehearsing unto him the Prophecy of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a desire to know the errand, which Jehu thought meet meet to let them know, as doubting vvhether they had over-heard all the talk or no. When he had acquainted them vvith the vvhole matter, they made no delay, but forthwith proclaimed him King. For the Prophecy of Elias vvas vvell known among them, neither durſt any one oppoſe himſelf againſt him, that vvas by God ordained to perform it.

Jehu, vvho had upon the ſudden this great honour thrown upon him, vvas not ſlow to put himſelf in poſſeſſion of it, but uſed the firſt heat of their affections, vvho joyned vvith him, in ſetting on foot the buſineſs vvhich nearly concerned him, and vvas not to be fore-ſlowed, being no more his own than Gods.

The firſt care vvas that no news of the revolt might be carried to Jezreel, vvhereby the King might have had vvarning either to fight or flee: this being foreſeen, he marched ſwiftly away, to take the Court vvhile it vvas yet ſecure. King Jehoram vvas now ſo vvell recovered of his Wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for vvhich cauſe it ſeems that there vvas much feaſting, and joy made, eſpecially by Queen Jezabel, who kept her ſtate ſo vvell, that the brethren of Ahazia coming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to ſalute the Queen, as to viſit the King.

Certain it is, that ſince the rebellion of Moab againſt Iſrael, the houſe of Ahab did never ſo much flouriſh as at this time. Seventy Princes of the bloud Royal there were that livèd in Samaria; Jehoram the ſon of Queen Jezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vain, with loſs of his life; and he won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now paſt, but the honour likely to continue. The amity was ſo great between Iſrael and Juda, that it might ſuffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of ſucceſs to any rebellious enterprizer: ſo that now the prophecy of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwiſe remembred, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the majeſtical face of the Court, wherein ſo great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and forty Princes of his blood expected.

In the middeſt of this ſecurity, whileſt theſe great Eſtates were (perhaps) either conſulting about proſecution of their intents, firſt againſt the Aramites, and then againſt Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies: or elſe were triumphing in joy of that which was already atchieved, and the Queen-mother dreſſing her ſelf in the braveſt manner to come down amongſt them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower diſcovered a company coming. Theſe news were not very troubleſome: for the Army that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be ready againſt all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be diſcharged upon ſome notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not ſtir. Onely the King ſent out an Horſe-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The meſſenger coming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might be. The ſeeming negligence of this fellow in not returning vvith an anſwer, might argue the matter to be of ſmall importance: yet the King to be ſatisfied, ſent out another that ſhould bring him vvord how all vvent; and he vvas likewiſe detained by Jehu. Theſe dumb ſhews bred ſome ſuſpicion in Jehoram, vvhom the Watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew ſo near, that they might, though not perfectly, be diſcerned, and notice taken of Jehu himſelf by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that vvas loth to diſcover any vveakneſs, cauſed his Chariot to be made ready, and iſſued forth with Ahazia King of Juda in his company, whoſe preſence added majeſty to his train, when ſtrength to reſiſt, or expedition to flee, had been more needful. This could not be done ſo haſtily, but that Jehu was come even to the towns end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to ſalute Jehu with terms of peace, but receiving a bitter anſwer, his heart failed him, ſo that crying out upon the treaſon to his fellow King, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu ſoon overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he ſtruck him dead, and threw his carkaſs into that field, which, purchaſed with the bloud of the rightful owner, was to be watered with the bloud of the unjuſt poſſeſſor. Neither did Ahazia eſcape ſo well, but that he was arreſted by a Wound, which held him till death did ſeize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the City, where Jezabel might ſoon be advertiſed of this calamity, if ſhe did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercy, whoſe judgment, pronounced againſt her long before, had overtaken her, when ſhe leaſt expected it. But ſhe, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her ſelf ready in all haſte, and painted her face, hoping with her ſtately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at leaſt to utter ſome Apophthegme that ſhould expreſs her brave ſpirit, and brand him with ſuch a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did ſhe think upon the hungry dogs that were ordained to devour her, whoſe paunches the ſtibium, with which ſhe beſmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the ſcolding language wherewith ſhe armed her tongue could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehu drew near, ſhe opened her window, and looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his treaſon, and murther of the King his Maſter. This was in meer humane valuation ſtoutly ſpoken, but was indeed a part of miſerable folly; as are all things, howſoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own Eunuchs that ſtood by and heard her, were not affected ſo much as with any compaſſion of her fortune; much leſs was her enemy daunted with her proud ſpirit. When Jehu ſaw that ſhe did uſe the little remainder of her life in ſeeking to vex him, he made her preſently to underſtand her own eſtate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her ſervants to know which of them would be on his ſide, and ſoon found them ready to offer their ſervice before the very face of their proud Lady. Hereupon he commanded them to caſt her down head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatneſs and eſtate, wherein ſhe had a few hours before ſhined ſo gloriouſly in the eyes of men; of men that conſidered not the judgments of God that had been denounced againſt her.

So periſhed this accurſed woman by the rude hands of her own ſervants, at the commandment of her greateſt enemy, that was yeſterday her ſubject, but now her Lord: and ſhe periſhed miſerably, ſtrugling in vain with baſe grooms, who contumelioufly did hale and thruſt her, whileſt her inſulting enemy ſate on horſe-back, adding indignity to her grief by ſcornful beholding the ſhameful manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carkaſs that was left without the Walls, vvas devoured by dogs, and her very memory vvas odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatry, murther, and oppreſſion, with ſlow, but ſure payment, and full intereſt.

Ahazia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehu, was overtaken by the way where he lurked; and receiving his deadly Wound in the Kingdom of Samaria, was ſuffered to get him gone (which he did in all haſte) and ſeek his burial in his own Kingdom: and this favour he obtained for his Grand-fathers ſake, not for his Fathers nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jeruſalem, where he was enterred with his Anceſtors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia; and whoſe ſon he was that ſucceeded her.

§. I.

Of Athalia's uſurping the Kingdom, and what pretences ſhe might forge.

2 Chron. 22. 9. AFter the death of Ahazia, it is ſaid that his houſe was not able to retain the Kingdom: which Note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her ſon, have given occaſion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Joas, who reigned ſhortly after. For Athalia being thus diſpoiled of her ſon, under whoſe name ſhe had ruled at her pleaſure, did forthwith lay hold upon all the Princes of the blood, and ſlew them, that ſo ſhe might occupy the Royal Throne her ſelf, and reign as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before-hand put into great place, and made Counſellors unto her ſon, ſuch as were fitteſt for her purpoſe, and ready at all times to execute her will: that ſhe kept a ſtrong guard about her, it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobility, had made the people tame, and fearful to ſtir, whatſoever they ſaw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent ſoever it be, is ſeldom or never ſo ſhameleſs as to refuſe the commodity of goodly pretences offering themſelves; but rather ſcrapes together all that will any way ſerve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not abſurd for us to think, that Athalia, when ſhe ſaw the Princes of the Royal bloud, all of them in a manner, ſlain by her huſband, and afterwards his own children deſtroyed by the Philiſtims, began even then to play her own game, reducing by artificial practice, into fair likelihoods, thoſe poſſibilities wherewith her huſ-bands bad fortune had preſented her. Not without great ſhew of reaſon, either by her own mouth, or by ſome truſty creature of hers might ſhe give him to underſtand, how needful it were to take the beſt order whilſt as yet he might, for fear of the worſt that might happen. If the iſſue of David, which now remained only in his family, ſhould by any accident fail (as wofull experience had already ſhewed what might after come to paſs) the people of Juda were not unlikely to chooſe a King of ſome new ſtock, a popular ſeditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his own unworthineſs, would not care what aſperſions he laid upon that Royal houſe, which was fallen down. And who could aſſure him, that ſome ambitious ſpirit, fore-ſeeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the deſtruction of him, and all his ſeed? Wherefore it were the wiſeſt way to deſign by his authority, not only his ſucceſſor, but alſo the reverſioner, and ſo to provide, that the Crown might never be ſubject to any rifling, but remain in the diſpoſition of them that loved him beſt, if the worſt that might be feared comming to paſs, his own poſterity could not retain it.

Such perſwaſions being urged, and earneſtly followed, by the importunate ſollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think, that the onely way to fruſtrate all devices of ſuch as gaped after a change, was to make her heir the laſt and youngeſt of his houſe, whom it moſt concerned, as being the Queen Mother, to uphold the firſt and eldeſt.

If Athalia took no ſuch courſe as this in her husbands time, yet might ſhe do it in her ſons. For Ahazia (beſides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely to take much care for the ſecurity of his half-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in reſpect of his own-born Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children baſely begotten. But if this miſchievous woman forgat her ſelf ſo far in her wicked policy, that ſhe loſt all opportunity which the weakneſs of her husband and ſon did afford, of procuring unto her ſelf ſome ſeeming Title; yet could ſhe afterwards feign ſome ſuch matter, as boldly ſhe might: being ſure that none would ask to ſee her evidence, for fear of being ſent to learn the certainty of her ſon or husband in another World. But I rather think that ſhe took order for her affairs before-hand. For though ſhe had no reaſon to ſuſpect or fear the ſudden death of her ſon, yet it was the wiſeſt way to provide betimes againſt all that might happen, whileſt her husbands iſſue by other women was young and unable to reſiſt. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephews of Ahazia, to the number of two and forty, were ſent to the Court of Iſrael, only to ſalute the children of the King, and the children of the Queen. The ſlender occaſion of which long journey, conſidered together with the quality of theſe perſons (being in effect all the ſtock of Jehoram that could be grown to any ſtrength) makes it very ſuſpicious, that their entertainment in Jezabels houſe would onely have been more formall, but little differing in ſubſtance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courſes held both before and after by theſe two Queens, will find cauſe enough to think no leſs. Of ſuch as have aſpired unto Lordſhips not belonging to them, and thruſt out the right Heirs by pretence of Teſtaments, that had no other validity than the ſword of ſuch as claimed by them could give, Hiſtories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentiful examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may ſay, Behold, this is new? It hath been already in the old time that was before us. That a King might ſhed his brothers blood, was proved by Salomon upon Adonia; that he might alien the Crown from his natural Heirs, David had given proof; but theſe had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that pleaſe them, will neglect the reaſons of thoſe examples, if they pleaſe them not, and reſt contented with the practice, as more willing by ſhewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon ſlew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entring into another. Jehoram ſlew all his brethren, which were better than he: David purchaſed the Kingdom, and might the more freely diſpoſe of it, yet he diſpoſed of it as the Lord appointed: if Jehoram, who had loſt much and gotten nothing, thought that he might alien the remainder at his pleaſure; or if Ahazia ſought to cut off the ſucceſſion of his brethren, or of their iſſue; either of theſe was to be anſwered with the words which Jehojada the Prieſt uſed afterwards, in declaring the title of Joaſh: Behold, the Kings ſon muſt reign; as the Lord hath ſaid of the ſon of David. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend ſome title, whatſoever it might be, to the Crown of Juda; yet it is moſt certain that ſhe had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treachery, murder, and open violence, and ſo ſhe held it ſix whole years, and a part of the ſeventh, in good ſeeming ſecurity.

§. II.

How Jehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

IN all this time Jehu did never goe about to disturb her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himself, rooting out the posterity of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in wars against the Aramites, wherein he was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much less attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventy living in Samaria, out of which number Jehu by letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well understood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they took example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in less than one daies warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were enjoyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtilty, feigning a great sacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them all together into one Temple, where he slew them: and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impiety.

Concerning the Idolatry devised by Jeroboam, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Jehu to destroy it. For he needed not to fear lest the people should be allured unto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruel Tyranness: he had received his kingdom by the unexpected grace of God; and further in regard of his zeal expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised notwithstanding his following the sin of Jeroboam, that the kingdom should remain in his Family to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serve; he would needs help to piece out Gods providence with his own circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedy gamester, who by stealing a needless Card to assure himself of winning a stake, forfeits his whole test. He had questionless displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatry of Jeroboam. Yet all these, how many soever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom (to retain them) he now forsook, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may find in the Prophecy of Elizeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire; and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rend in pieces their women with child. So did not only the wickedness of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable misery upon all the Land. For the fury of Hazaels victory was not quenched with the destruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invasion; but he smote them in all the coast of Israel, and wasted all the Country beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seems that the people repented not of their Idolatry; (For in those daies the Lord began to loath Israel;) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble house of Ahab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, & had bravely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were fain to make woful shifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in serving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease & the pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, overwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to avoid; and therein by God, whom they first forsook, forsaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wisdom, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of Athaliah's Government.

THese calamities falling upon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giving her leisure to look to things at home: as having little little to do abroad, unless it were so that she held some correspondency with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her Husbands Grand-father King Asa, who had done the like. And some probability that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we find, that this 2 Chro. 24 7. wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon Baalim. Such a sacriledge, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her own Idolatry, with such pomp as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some fair pretext of necessity of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was fain to do the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Priests and Levites was very notable, and served (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the Religion taught by God himself, howsoever the Queens proceedings advanced the contrary. For the poverty of that sacred Tribe of Levi must needs have been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they lived, being now very few and small; and the store, laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by shameful robbery. Yet they up-held in all this misery the service of God, and the daily sacrifice keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no less than in those dayes wherein their entertainment was far better.

§. IV.
Of the preservation of Joas.

Jehojada then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wise, and religious man. To his carefulness it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort up-held in those unhappy times. His Wife was Jehoshabeth, who was daughter of King Jehoram, and sister to Ahazia, a godly Lady and vertuous, whose piety makes it seem that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrary: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her own Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be such as she was. By her care Joash the young Prince that reigned soon after, was conveighed out of the nursery, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly he was brought up. How it came to pass that this young child was not hunted out, when his body was missing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policy, that the people should hear say, that one of the children had avoyded that cruel blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and so be the less conformable to their present government. So Joash was delivered out of that slaughter, he and his nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be cast away, as having no other guard than a poor Woman that gave him suck, who foolishly doubting that she her self should have been slain, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coin such tales, and rather swear them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their joyful tidings.

§. V.
Whose Son Joas was.

¶. I.
Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the Son of Ahazia.

NOw concerning this Joash, whose son he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirm, and hath caused much controversie among Writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the son of Ahazia, seem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give title of Son unto him, in regard that he was his Successour, I neither by my self can find, nor can by any help of Authors learn how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the natural son of Ahaziah. For whereas it is said, that the house of Ahazia was not able to retain the Kingdome; some do inferre that this Joash was not properly called his son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as son in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For she perceiving that the Kingdom was to fall into their hands, in whom she had no interest, might easily find cause to fear, that the tyranny exercised by her husband at her instigation upon so many noble Houses, would now be revenged upon her self. The ruine of her Idolatrous Religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Jezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queen. All this had little concerned her, if her own grand-child had been heir to the Crown; for she that had power enough to make her self Queen, could with more ease, and lesse envy, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authority she might have done her pleasure, and been the more both obeyed by others, and secure of her own estate, as not wanting an heir. Wherefore it was not needful, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the Child of her own Son, of whose life she might have made greater use than she could of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grandmothers to their Nephews, is little less than the Mothers to their Children.
2 King. 11 2. & 2 Chro. 22. 11.
2 Chro. 22. 9.

This argument is very strong. For it may seem incredible, that all natural affection should be cast aside, when as neither necessity urgeth, nor any commodity thereby gotten requireth it, yea, when all humane policy doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perswaded.

§. II.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

BUt (as it is more easie to find a difficulty in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise been) the pedigree of this Joash is, by them which think him not the son of Ahazia, set down in such sort, that it may very justly be suspected. They say, that he descended from Nathan the son of David, and not from Salomon: to which purpose they bring a History (I know whence) of two Families of the race of David, saying, that the line of Salomon held the Kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the Family of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the son of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of David, by Bathsua the daughter of Ammes, and therefore could not be the Prophet. 1 Chron. 3. 5.

Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, have likewise held the same of Joash, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods to have been the children of Uriah the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew Expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himself the only begotten of his mother, do approve this exposition: for we read of no more than two sons which Bathsua or Bathsheba did bear unto David, whereof the one begotten in adultery, died an Infant, and Salomon only of her children by the King did live. So that the rest must needs have been the children of Uriah, and are thought to have been Davids only by adoption. Wherefore if Joas had not been the son of Ahazia, then must that pedigree have been false, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Salomon: yea, then had not our blessed Saviour issued from the loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only been of his line by courtesie of the Nation, and form of law, as any other might have been. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawn many late Writers into the opinion that Joash was not of the posterity of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Frier Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo, hath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speak what he list.

§. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the son of Jehoram.

IN so doubtful a case, if it seem lawful to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, me thinks it were not amiss to open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise he would give him a light, and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a son left him, save Jehoahas the youngest of his sons. Now if it were in regard of Gods promise to David, that after those massacres of Jehoram upon all his brethren, and of the Philistims and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the seed of David escaped; why may 2 King. 8. 19.

it not be thought that he was ſaid to have eſcaped, in whom the line of David was preſerved? for had all the race of Salomon been rooted up in theſe woful Tragedies, and the progeny of Nathan ſucceeded in place thereof; like enough it is that ſome remembrance more particular would have been extant, of an event ſo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguiſhed, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preſervation of the houſe of David, mentioned in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the perſon of Jehoahas, in whom the Royal branch of Salomon, the natural, and not only legal iſſue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joaſh, who followed Athalia in the Kingdom, was the youngeſt ſon of Jehoram, whoſe life Athalia, as a ſtep-dame, was not likely to purſue. For it were not eaſily underſtood, why the preſervation of Davids line, by Gods eſpecial mercy, in regard of his promiſe made, ſhould pertain rather to
2 King. 10. 13. that time, when beſides Ahazia himſelf, there were two and forty of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) ſons of his brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all ſlain by Jehu; than have reference to the lamentable deſtruction and little leſs than extirpation of that progeny, wherein
2 Chron. 21 8. one onely did eſcape. Certainly that inhumane murther which Jehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Hiſtory) revenged upon his own children; then was not this vengeance of God accompliſhed by the Philiſtims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards proſecuted by Jehu, and finally took effect by the hands of that ſame wicked woman, at whoſe inſtigation he had committed ſuch barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavy judgment laid upon
2 Chron. 24. 14. Jehoram and all his children, onely Jehoahas his youngeſt ſon was exempted; whom therefore if I ſhould affirm to be the ſame with Joas, which is called the ſon of Ahazia, I ſhould not want good probability. Some further appearance of neceſſity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwiſe have been. For it was the youngeſt ſon of Jehoram in whom the race was preſerved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, ſeeing that he was twenty years old at the leaſt (as is already noted) when he began to reign, and conſequently, was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram ſhould have begotten many children before he was eighteen years old, or that having (as he had) many wives and children, he ſhould upon the ſudden, at his eighteenth year, become unfruitful, and beget no more in twenty years following: each of which muſt have bin true, if this were true that Ahazia was the ſame Jehoahas which was his youngeſt ſon. But this inconvenience is taken away, and thoſe other doubts ariſing from the cauſleſs cruelty of Athalia, in ſeeking the life of Joas are eaſily cleared, if Joas and Jehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withſtand this opinion; For he was ſeven years old when he began to reign; which if we underſtand of years compleat, he might have been a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten ſomewhat after the beginning of his ſickneſs. Neither is it more abſurd to ſay that he was the natural ſon of Jehoram, though called the ſon of Ahazia, than it were to ſay, as great Authors have done, this difficulty notwithſtanding, that he was of the poſterity of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to anſwer; which, had it concurred with the reſt, might have ſerved as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahas, that ſoundeth much more near to Joas, than to Ahaziah, in an Engliſh ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by ſome, ſkilful in that language) through the diverſity of certain letters, differ much from that which it moſt reſembleth in our Weſtern manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be ſo that Ahazia himſelf be alſo called Azaria, and muſt have had three names, if he were the ſame with Jehoahas; in which
2 Chron 22 5. manner Joas might alſo have had ſeveral names; yet, becauſe I find no other warrant hereof than a bare poſſibility, I will not preſume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the conſideration of ſuch as have more ability to judge, and leiſure to conſider of this point.

§. IV.

Upon what reaſons Athalia might ſeek to deſtroy Joas, if he were her own Grandchild.

IF therefore we ſhall follow that vvhich is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be ſaid, that Athalia vvas not only blinded by the paſſions of ambition and zeal to her Idolatrous vvorſhip of Baalim, but purſued the accompliſhment of ſome unnatural deſires, in ſeeking the deſtruction of her grand-child, and the reſt of the bloud Royal. For whether

ther it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruel Women are not alwayes chast) had imitated the liberty of Jezabel her sister in law, whose Whoredoms were upbraided by Jehu to her son; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely, in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certain it is that she had sons of her own, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to settle the Crown upon her own children, she did seek to cut off, by wicked policy, all other claims. As for Joas, if she were his Grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would have in him, lest when he came to years, it might draw him from her devotion. And hereof (besides that Women do commonly better love their daughters Husbands, than their sons Wives) there is some appearance in the reign of her son; for she made him spend all his time in idle journeys, to no other apparent end, than that she might rule at home; and he living abroad be estranged from his Wife, and entertain some new fancies, wherein Jezabel had cunning enough to be his Tutoress. But when the sword of Jehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine devices, then was Athalia fain to go roundly to work, and do as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. otherwise, if (as I could rather think) she were only stepdame to Joas, we need not seek into the reasons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

2 King 9 21.

§. VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of using conjecture in Histories.

THus much concerning the person of Joas, from vvhom, as from a new root, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of vvhich matter, the more I consider the nature of this History, and the diversity between it and others, the less me thinks I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deserving blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldness in liberty of conjecture. For all Histories do give us information of humane counsels and events, as far forth as the knowledge and faith of the Writers can afford; but of Gods Will, by vvhich all things are ordered, they speak only at random, and many times falsly. This we often find in profane Writers, vvho ascribe the ill success of great undertakings, to the neglect of some impious Rites, vvhereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended vvith the omission. Hereat vve may the less vvonder, if vve consider the answer made by the Jewes in Egypt unto Jeremy the Prophet reprehending their Idolatry. For howsoever the vvritten Law of God vvas known unto the people, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt thereof vvere very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet vvere they so obstinately bent unto their Wils, that they vvould not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction, But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queen of heaven, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to do: For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no evil: adding, that all manner of miseries were befaln them, since they left off that service of the Queen of Heaven. So blind is the wisedome of man, in looking into the counsel of God, which to find out, there is no better nor other guide than his own written Will not perverted by vain additions.

Jer. 44. 17, 18.

But this History of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that have been written by the most sufficient of meerly humane Authors: it setteth down expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his over-frowardness in battel; the ruine of his Family, to the security of Jehoram in Jezreel; not the Victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel by the comming of Jehu; but referring all unto the Will of God, I mean, to his revealed Will, from which that his hidden purposes do not vary, this Story, by many great examples, gives most notable proof. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these Books nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidny, that Historians do borrow of Poets, not only much of their Ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not always true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discover the passions which do set them first on foot. Wherefore they are fain (I speak of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Livy every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Asdrubol in Italy, fitting all to another busineſs, or any practice of that kind, is neither Hiſtorical, nor Poetical) to ſearch into the particular humour of Princes, and of thoſe which have governed their affections, or the inſtruments by which they wrought; from whence they do collect the moſt likely motives or impediments of every buſineſs; and ſo figuring as near to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciouſly conſider the defects in counſel, or obliquity in proceeding.

Sir Phil. Sid. in his Apol. for Poetry.

nes,

Yet all this, for the moſt part, is not enough to give aſſurance, howſoever it may give ſatisfaction. For the heart of man is unſearchable: and Princes, howſoever their intents be ſeldom hidden from ſome of thoſe many eyes which pry both into them, and into ſuch as live about them; yet ſometimes either by their own cloſe temper, or by ſome ſubtil miſts, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themſelves lye dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat, are converted to another uſe. The induſtry of an Hiſtorian, having ſo many things to weary it, may well be excuſed, when finding apparent cauſe enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further ſearch; though it often fall out, where ſundry occaſions work to the ſame end, that one ſmall matter in a weak mind is more effectual, than many that ſeem far greater. So comes it many times to paſs, that great fires, which conſume whole houſes or towns, begin with a few ſtraws, that are waſted or not ſeen; when the flame is diſcovered, having faſtened upon ſome Wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Queſtionleſs it is, that the War commenced by Darius, and purſued by Xerxes againſt the Greeks, proceeded from deſire of the Perſians to inlarge their Empire: howſoever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noiſed abroad as the ground of that quarrel; yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton deſire of Queen Atoſſa, to have the Grecian dames her bond-women, did firſt move Darius to prepare for this War before he had received any injury, and when he did not yet ſo much deſire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

I will not here ſtand to argue whether Herodotus be more juſtly reprehended by ſome, or defended by others, for alledging the vain appetite, and ſecret ſpeech of the Queen in bed with her Huſband, as the cauſe of thoſe great evils following; this I may boldly affirm (having, I think, in every eſtate ſome ſufficient witneſs) that matters of much conſequence, founded in all ſeeming upon ſubſtantial reaſons, have iſſued indeed from ſuch petty trifles, as no Hiſtorian would either think upon, or could well ſearch out.

Therefore it was a good anſwer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope, made to a certain Frier, coming to viſit him in his Popedom, as having long before in his meaner eſtate, been his familiar friend. This poor Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to uſe his old liberty of ſpeech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was poſſible for his Holineſs, whom he rather took for a direct honeſt man, than any cunning Politician, to attain unto the Papacy; in compaſſing of which, all the ſubtilty (ſaid he) of the moſt crafty brains, find work enough: and therefore the more I think upon the Art of the Conclave, and your unaptneſs thereto, the more I needs muſt wonder. Pope Sixtus to ſatisfie the plain dealing Frier, dealt with him again as plainly, ſaying, Hadſt thou lived abroad as I have done, and ſeen by what folly this world is governed, thou wouldeſt wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto thoſe exorbitant Engines, by which the courſe of affairs is moved, the Pope ſaid true. For the wiſeſt of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutual toleration, work more cloſely, and earneſtly, than right reaſon either needs or can. But if we lift up our thoughts to that ſupreme Governour, of whoſe Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was ſaid of Jupiter.

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventoſum, & urbes, regnaque triſtia,
Divoſque mortaleſque turmas,
Imperio regit unus æquo.

Who rules the duller Earth, the Wind-ſwoln ſtreams,
The civil Cities, and th' infernal Realms,
Who th' Hoſt of Heaven, and the mortal Band,
Alone doth govern by his juſt command.

Then ſhall we find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change; he foreſeeth all things, and all things diſpoſeth to his own honour; He neither deceiveth nor can be deceived, but continuing one and the ſame for ever, doth conſtantly govern all creatures by that Law, which he hath preſcribed, and will never alter. The vanities of men beguile their vain contrivers, and the proſperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their deſtruction: yea, this broad broad and headlong paſſage to hell, is not ſo delightful as it ſeems at the firſt entrance, but hath growing in it, beſides the poyſons which infect the ſoul, many cruel thorns deeply wounding the body; all which if any few eſcape, they have onely this miſerable advantage of others, that their deſcent was the more ſwift and expedite. But the ſervice of God is the path guiding us to perfect happineſs, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yeilding ſuch abundance of joy to the conſcience, as doth eaſily countervail all afflictions whatſoever; though indeed thoſe brambles that ſometimes tear the ſkin of ſuch as walk in this bleſſed way, do commonly lay hold upon them at ſuch time as they ſit down to take their eaſe, and make them wiſh themſelves at their journeys end, in the preſence of their Lord whom they faithfully ſerve, in whoſe preſence is the fulneſs of joy, and at whoſe right hand are pleaſures for ever.

Pſal. 66. 11.

Wherefore it being the end and ſcope of all Hiſtory, to teach by example of times paſt, ſuch Wiſdom as may guide our deſires and actions, we ſhould not marvel though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Iſrael, being written by men inſpired with the Spirit of God, inſtruct us chiefly, in that which is moſt requiſite for us to know; as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illuſtrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wiſdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by ſome Prophet after the captivity: we may well believe that the counſel of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous Will, ſhould have occupied either the whole or the principal room in that narration. Yet had not the purpoſe of Darius, the deſire of his Wife, and the buſineſs at Sardes, with other occurrents, been the leſs true, though they might have been omitted, as the leſs material: but theſe things it had been lawful for any man to gather out of prophane Hiſtories, or out of circumſtances otherwiſe appearing, wherein he ſhould not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborn to derogate from the firſt cauſes, by aſcribing to the ſecond more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the buſineſs that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any man of judgment will tax me, as either fabulous or preſumptuous. For he doth not feign, that rehearſeth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that ſeeketh to illuſtrate and make good in humane reaſon, thoſe things which authority alone, without further circumſtance, ought to have confirmed in every mans belief. And this may ſuffice in defence of the liberty which I have uſed in conjectures, and may hereafter uſe when occaſion ſhall require, as neither unlawful, nor miſ-beſeeming an Hiſtorian.

The conſpiracy againſt Athalia.

WHen Athalia had now ſix years and longer worn the Crown of Juda, and had found neither any forreign enemy, nor domeſtical adverſary to diſturb her poſſeſſion, ſuddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickedneſs meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and ſhameful death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be ſuch, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very unfitting that his education ſhould be ſimple, to make him ſeem the child of ſome poor man (as for his ſafety it was requiſite) when his capacity required to have been indued with the ſtomack and qualities meet for a King. All this Jehojada the Prieſt conſidered, and withall, the great increaſe of impiety, which taking deep root in the Court, was likely to ſpread it ſelf over all the Country, if care were not uſed to weed it up very ſpeedily. Wherefore he aſſociated unto himſelf five of the Captains, in whoſe fidelity he had beſt aſſurance; and having taken an oath of them, and ſhewed them the Kings ſon, he made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdom. Theſe drew in others of the principal men, to countenance the action, procuring at the firſt onely that they ſhould repair to Jeruſalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perſwaſions to win them to the buſineſs: the promiſe of the Lord unto the houſe of David, was enough to aſſure them that the action was both lawful, and likely to ſucceed as they deſired.

But in compaſſing their intent, ſome difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they ſhould bring their purpoſe to good iſſue; neither were the Captains, and other aſſociates of Jehojada able by cloſe working, to draw together ſo many truſty and ſerviceable hands as would ſuffice to manage the buſineſs. To help in this caſe, case, the Priest gave order to such of the Levites as had finished their courses in waiting on the Divine service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turns, that they should not depart until they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new comers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard, and that was enough: for if the Tyranness did not prevail against them at the first brunt, the favour of the People was like to shew it self on their side, who made head against her. These Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captains, and other adherents, were bestowed in the outer Courts: As for Weapons, the Temple it self had store enough; King David had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readiness, and the day come, wherein this high design was to be put in execution; Jehojada delivered unto the Captains, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard unto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crown; using all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queen was the last that heard any word. Which is not so strange as it may seem: for insolent natures, by dealing outragiously with such as bring them ill tidings, do commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilest yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the suddenness, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischief.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with the very good liking. Some carried home the news, others ran forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of peril, under the windows of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise of folks in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much unusual passion in their looks, did presently conceive, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoever it were, she meant to use her own wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may be, that she thought it some especial solemnity used in the Divine service, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the unaccustomed number of Levites, and of other devout men, about the town, might give some presumption.

2 Chron. 23. 12.

Many things argue that she little thought upon her own Tragedy; although Josephus would make it seem otherwise. For we find in the Text, She came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was near to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, she rent her cloaths, and cryed Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or fear, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her self, as one cast away, and cried out in vain upon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Josephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, she entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I find no where in Scripture, neither do I hold it credible. For had she truly known how things went, she would surely have gathered her friends about her, and used those forces in defence of her Crown, by which she gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that she, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troop, yet it had been meer madness in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if she, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their own weapons, could prevail to let in her guard, would nevertheless take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of seven years old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to be armed in his defence, may we not think that she was mad in the most extreme degree? Certain it is that the counsel of God would have taken effect, in her destruction, had she used the most likely means to disappoint it: yet we need not so cut her throat with any moral impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeal of Jehojada found more easie success, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could have been expected; so that at his appointment, she was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and slain, yea so, that no bloud, save her own, was shed in that quarrel; her small train that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Jezabel.

MOst like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashness of her Nephew Jehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himself into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, onely through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet she her self, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived such a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a suitable death. These two Queens were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her Husband; was an Idolatress and a Murdress. The onely difference appearing in their condition, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them surviving her Husband about eight years, did spend their time in satisfying her own affections; the one using tyranny, as the exercise of her haughty mind; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seem in this world to pertain unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the sudden by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slain at her own horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel the more indignity, and shame of body. Touching their burial, Jezabel was devoured by Dogs, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia we do not find. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slain the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her burial there is no monument, for she was a Church-robber. The service of Baal erected by these two Queens, was destroyed as soon as they were gone, and their Chaplains, the Priests of that Religion, slain. Herein also it came to pass, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who slew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrel to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel perished in few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; she had sons living after she was Queen, of whom, or of any other, that they were slain with her, we do not find.

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had been in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as nearly, and been registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbad that the children should die for the fathers, could not have saved these ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every man should die for his own sin. Seeing therefore that they had been professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoil of it; likely it is, that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehojada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawful cause enough requiring their death, so the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much, and that very earnestly. For these had been esteemed as heirs of their mothers Crown, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular business of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdom. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his Wars against Jehu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehojada might, with the more confidence, adventure to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Joas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

Of Joas his doings, whilest Jehojada the Priest lived.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Country of Juda was filled with great joy and quietness; wherein Joas, a child of seven years old, or there-about, began his reign, which continued almost forty years. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that honourable man Jehojada the Priest, who did as faithfully govern the Kingdom, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him unto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he took by appointment of Jehojada two Wives, and begat Sons and Daughters, repairing the Family of David which was almost worn out. The first Act that he took in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needful piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickedness of ungodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should uphold the Temple, whom the Temple had upheld. This business he followed with so earnest a zeal, that not only the Levites were more slack than he, but even Jehojada was fain to be quickned by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the work: partly out of the tax imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the people; who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver; and with all other Utensils. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had been, and the service of God was magnificently celebrated.

2 Chron. 24. 14.

§. II.

The Death of Jehojada, and Apostasie of Joas.

BUt this endured no longer than the life of Jehojada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty years, dyed before his Country could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda; as he well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet this honourable Funeral seems to have been given to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the City of David. As for the King himself, who did owe to him no less than his Crown and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heavy debt.

For after the death of Jehojada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soon forgat, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old Counsellor, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himself, the Author of all goodness. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Jehoram and Athalia had so infected the Country, in fifteen or sixteen years, that thirty years, or thereabout, of the reign of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to clear it from that mischief. The King himself, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the service of God; and a manifest proof of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the sowre admonitions of devout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the stage, he had striven to express much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

§. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Juda in the dayes of Joas.

BUt God, from whom he was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Town of the Philistims, addressed himself towards Jerusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough that the Kings of Juda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I think he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdom of Juda had molested the Aramites in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompenced, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extream misery, to the fury of Hazael himself. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dog, and stir up against himself a powerful enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his own Kingdom, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good success, as might rather advance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sons of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries usually doe) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutral in the war between him and Israel, but to joyn all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who like a bloody Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queens, their mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdom of Juda. Howsoever we find, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore took all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasure of the house of the Lord, or in his own house, with which present he redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionless) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazzard the assurance of this for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich booty of unhappy treasure, which belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirty seventh year of Joas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoahaz, he made this purchase; but in the same or very next year he died, leaving all that he had unto his son Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

2 King. 12 18.

This enterprise of Hazaels, is, by some, confounded with that war of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second book of Chronicles. But the reasons alledged by them that hold the contrary opinion, doe forcibly prove, that it was not all one war. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life. In the one Hazael himself was present; in the other, he was not named: but contrarywise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have been the son of Hazael) is said to have been at Damascus. The first Army came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Juda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Joas (in vain, for God was against him) to deal with them, as having a very great Army. 2 Chro. 24.

Now, concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsook him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jehojada the Priest, because that story is joyned to the restauration of the Temple. This had been probable, if the death of Jehojada had been afterwards mentioned in that place of the second book of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will and pleasure; neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Job that righteous man, or the death of Josias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgement upon the house of Ahab. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were used in the house of the Lord continually all the daies of Jehojada; soon after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the sixt, or thirty seventh year of this Joas his reign, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foul Idolater. 2 Chro. 24 11.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have alwaies tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being Psal. 115. 15. being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with evil and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even and strict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment; and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickedness be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that he dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetful of God and all goodness, as if he had stroven to exceed the wickedness of all that went before him, and to leave such a villanous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

§. IV.

How Zacharia was murthered by Joas.

SUndry Prophets having laboured in vain to reclaime the people from their superstition, Zacharia the son of Jehojada the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickedness, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and son to a man so exceedingly beloved in his life time, and reverenced, that if Joas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had born unto the King, and the unrecountable benefits which they had done unto him, from his first infancy, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though he had been otherwise a man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appeares that brings it. But this King Joas, having already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deal with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen, in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heir of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heir, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that mans deservings were, that did so, yea though Gods commandment required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any form of open Law, as was practised upon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treachery, I do neither read, nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracy, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publick judgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandment, by which he suffered, took place in stead of Law: which exercise of meer power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda.

Luke 20. 14.

§. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Amorites, and of his death.

THis odious murther, committed by an unthankful snake upon the man in whose bosom he had been fostered, as of it self alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hateful to men of his own time, and his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the Throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell down swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that ungrateful monster. It was the last year of his reign; the end of his time comming then upon him, when he thought himself beginning to live how he listed without controulment. When that year was expired the Aramites came into the Country, rather as may seem to get pillage, than to perform any great action; for they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to do more by them, than they themselves did hope for. 2 Chro. 24. 24.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloudy malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement proof sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when he might have levied (as his son after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the war, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might have his own will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rovers, he took a very great Army, so that wise men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Country, and expose himself to danger of war, when as indeed all was meer ostentation and no peril to be feared; he going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wise men think, and laugh at him in secret; considering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishness, did laugh not only at this vain-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Joas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders or by some amazement happening among the souldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to work, so it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebell to the King of Kings. As for Joas himself (as Abulensis and others expound the story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they think) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ransome.

And surely, all circumstances do greatly strengthen this conjecture: for the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon Joas ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they dismissed him, in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-favoredly. Now at that time Joas the son of Jehoahaz reigned over Israel, and Benhadad the son of Hazael over the Syrians, in Damascus: the one a valiant undertaking Prince, raised up by God to restore the State of his miserable Country, the other inferiour every way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keep it. The difference in condition found between these two Princes, promising no other event than such as afterward followed, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and pluck up his spirits, which Hazael had beaten down, if God had not been against him. But his fearful heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of war at his doores, it were easie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good success hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unsuspected) ill success, which the Aramites found in their following wars against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weakness of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdom of Juda, after more than forty years time of gathering strength, was unable to drive out a small company of Enemies; and the Kingdom of Israel, having so been trodden down by Hazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, ten Chariots, and ten thousand footmen were left; prevailed against his Son, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every-where found, and therefore I will not insist upon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, think it more tedious to hear long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, and saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda loaden with spoil, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not half so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammonites, and of a Moabites, whom some (becaus onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) think to have been bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or fear, lest (as Tyrants use) he should revenge disaster upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tels us plainly, that, For the blood of the children of Jehojada, this befell him. And the same appears to have been used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the son and successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdom was established: but contrariwise his body was judged unworthy of burial in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompenced by his son, upon the Traytors, which well deserved death. 2 Chro. 24. 25.

Of

§. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: of the time when Carthage was built: and of Dido.

THere lived with Joas, Mezades, and Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Aliadius, were Kings of the Albans in Italy. Ocrazapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirty seventh King succeeded unto Ophratanes, began his reign over the Assyrians, about the eighteenth year of Joas, which lasted forty two years. In the sixteenth of Joas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded unto Cheops in the Kingdom of Egypt, and held it fifty years.

In this time of Joas, was likewise the reign of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido; the building of which City is, by divers authors, placed in divers ages, some reporting it to be 70. years younger than Rome, others above 400. years elder, few or none of them giving any reason of their assertions, but leaving us uncertain whom to follow: Josephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three years and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth year of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Josephus) are very perplexed, and serve not very well to make cleer the totall sum. But whether it were so that Josephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the years, which he reckoned in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pigmalion, we may well enough believe, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose books he gives us the whole sum, had good means to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, between two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or four generations might easily reach, This hundred forty and four years current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleventh year of Joas, was a hundred forty and three years before the birth of Rome; and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Æneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Aulon. ep. 117.

Illa ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hospes,
Assimulata modis pulchraque mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens,
Vita nec incestis læta cupidinibus:
(Namque nec Æneas vidit me Troius unquam,
Nec Lybiam advenit, classibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atque arma procacis Iarbæ,
Servavi, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo castos quod pertulit enses)
Non furor, aut læso crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse juvat: vixi sine vulnere famæ,
Ulta virum, positis mœnibus oppetii.
Invida cur in me stimulasti Musa Maronem,
Fingeret ut nostræ damna pudicitiæ?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusq; canunt.
Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisque deos assimulant vitiis.

Which in effect is this:

I Am that Dido which thou here dost see,
Cunningly fram'd in beauteous Imag'rie,
Like this I was, but had not such a soul,
As Maro feign'd, incestuous and foul.
Æneas never with his Trojan hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mov'd by furious love or jealousie,
I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
Make way for death untimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Town,
Reveng'd my husbands death, liv'd with renown.
Why did'st thou stir up Virgil, envious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers, believe Historians; not those Which to the world Joves thefts and vice expose.
Poets are lyars, and for Verses sake,
Will make the Gods of humane crimes partake.

From the time of Dido unto the first Punick war, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we find in many Histories: but in particular we find little of the Carthaginian affairs before that war, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. We will therefore defer the relation of matters concerning that mighty City, until such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

The

The beginning of Amazia his reign: of Joas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

Amazia, the son of Joash, being twenty five years old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdom of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demean himself, as his new beginning reign might be least offensive. The Law of Moses he professed to observe; which howsoever it had been secretly despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea, and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deep root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himself unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himself, even whilst that execrable murther, committed by the King upon Zacharia, was yet fresh in memory, did serve as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an evil end. He therefore, having learned of his father the art of dissimulation, did not onely forbear to punish the Traitors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people having wearied it self into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handy-work of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceived his gouernment well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heat of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgments, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live: which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging son. This being done, and his own life better secured, by such exemplary justice, against the like attempts, Amazia carried himself outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen years.

As Amazia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long peace, so Joas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the war hotly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had been, worshipping the Calves of Jeroboam. For this sin had God so plagued the house of Jehu, that the ten tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his son Jehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Jehu, sufficed not to withdraw him from this politick Idolatry, so were the miseries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend unto the prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when he and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their own abominable ways. Therefore in temporal matters the ten Tribes recovered apace; but the favour of God which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor believe that they sought: that they had it not, I find in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amazia, the Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim. 2 Chro. 25. 7.

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperity of the Israelites under the reign of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz, wearied and broken with long adversity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himself in part of the heavy cares attending those unhappy Syrian Wars, by laying the burthen upon his hopeful son; we find that in the thirty seventh year of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the son of Jehoahaz began to reign over Israel in Samaria; which was in the 15. year of his fathers reign, and some two or three years before his death. 2 King. 13 10.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poor stock that he received from his Father, often Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seem likely to prove a thriver. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no less. For Joas visiting the Prophet, who lay sick, spake unto him thus, O my father, my father, the Chariots of Israel, and the horsmen of the same: by which manner of speech he did 2 King. 13 14.

acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had ſtood his kingdome in more ſtead than all the Horſes and Chariots could doe.

This prophet who ſucceeded unto Elias, about the firſt year of Joram the ſon of Ahab King of Iſrael died (as ſome have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehu. To ſhew how the ſpirit of Elias was doubled, or did reſt upon him, it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that he did not onely raiſe a dead child unto life, as Elias had done, but when he himſelfe was dead, it pleaſed God that his dead bones ſhould reſtore life unto a carcaſs, which touched them in the grave. In fine, he beſtowed as a legacie, three victories upon King Joas, who thereby did ſet Iſrael in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had uſurped, and weakning the kings of Damaſco in ſuch ſort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amazia his war againſt Edom; His Apoſtacy, and overthrow by Joas.

The happy ſucceſs which Joas had found in his war againſt the Aramites, was ſuch as might kindle in Amazia a deſire of undertaking ſome expedition, wherein himſelf might purchaſe the like honour. His Kingdom could furniſh three hundred thouſand ſerviceable men for the Wars, and his treaſures were ſufficient for the payment of theſe, and the hire of many more. Cauſe of war he had very juſt againſt the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his grand-father Jehoram, had about fifty years been unreclaimed, partly by reaſon of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the ſloth and timerouſneſs of his father Joas. Yet, foraſmuch as the men of Juda had in many years been without all exerciſe of War (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wiſdom to increaſe his forces, with ſouldiers waged out of Iſrael, whence he hired for an hundred talents of ſilver, an hundred thouſand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth us, though Joſephus diminiſheth the number, ſaying that they were but twenty thouſand.

2 Chro. 11. 6. Joſ. Antiq. Jud. l. 9. c. 10.

This great Army, vvhich vvith ſo much coſt Amazia had hired out of Iſrael, he vvas fain to diſmiſs before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet vvith ill ſucceſs, if he ſtrengthened himſelf vvith the help of thoſe men, vvhom God (though in mercy he gave them victory againſt the cruel Aramites) did not love, becauſe they vvere Idolaters. The Iſraelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this diſmiſſion, as an high diſgrace, vvhich to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their return, and ſhewed their malice in the ſlaughter of three thouſand men, and ſome ſpoil, which they carried away. But Amazia with his own forces, knowing that God would be aſſiſtant to their journey, entred couragiouſly into the Edomites Country; over whom obtaining victory, he ſlew ten thouſand, and took other ten thouſand priſoners, all which he threw from an high rock; holding them, it ſeems, rather as Traytors, than as juſt enemies. This victory did not ſeem to reduce Edom under the ſubjection of the Crown of Juda, vvhich might be the cauſe of that ſeverity, vvhich vvas uſed to the priſoners; the Edomites that had eſcaped, refuſing to buy the lives of their friends and kinſmen at ſo dear a rate, as the loſs of their own liberty. Some towns in Mount Seir, Amazia took, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they vvere the places moſt indefenſible, in that he left no garriſons there, vvhereby he might another year the better have purſued the conqueſt of the vvhole countrey. Howſoever it were, he got both honour by the journey, and gains enough, had he not loſt himſelf.

Among other ſpoyls of the Edomites, vvere carryed away their gods, vvhich being vanquiſhed and taken priſoners, did deſerve vvell to be led in triumph. But they contrarivviſe, I know not by vvhat ſtrange vvitchcraft, ſo beſotted this unworthy King Amazia that he ſet them up to be his gods, and worſhipped them, and burned incenſe unto them. 2 Chro. 25. 14.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet ſent from God, he gave a churliſh and threatning anſwer; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counſeller, and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the worſt. If either the coſtly ſtuffe, whereof theſe Idols were made, or the curious workmanſhip and beauty, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had raviſhed the Kings fancie; methinks, he ſhould have rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as houſehold ornaments and things of pleaſure, than thereby have ſuffered himſelf to be blinded, with ſuch unreaſonable devotion towards them. If the ſuperſtitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to work much upon his imagination; much more ſhould the bad ſervice which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it ſeems to me, that the same affections carried him from God, unto the service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to talk so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him fail of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should have limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was that Esau having broken the yoak of Jacob from his neck, according as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the countrey of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might have well contended with him.

2 Chro. 25. 11.

But there is a fooliſh and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe unto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their own industrie, courage, or foresight. Therefore it is commonly seen, that they, who entring into battell, are carefull to pray for aide from heauen, with due acknowledgment of his power, who is the giver of victory; when the field is won, doe vaunt of there own ex-ploits; one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to such a battalion; a third, how he seized on the enemies Canon; every one striving to magnifie himself, whilest all forget God, as one that had not been present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Authour of his happinesse; so he whose meer wisdome and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himself thankful, both for the victory, and for those vertues by which the victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weaknesse is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truely heroical, as that by which the spirit of man advanceth it self with confidence of acceptation, unto the love of God. In which sense it is a brave speech that Evander in Virgil useth to Æneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition.

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

With this Philosophy Amazia (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himself a better man of war than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferiour to David; of which honour he saw no reason why the prophets should rob him, who had made him loose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was distempered with such vain thoughts as these (besides the witnese of his impiety following) Josephus doth testifie saying, That he despised God, and that being puft up with his good success, of which nevertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Authour, he commanded Joas King of Israel to become his subject, and to let the ten Tribes acknowledge him their Soveraign, as they had done his Ancestours King David and Salomon. Some think that his quarrel to Joas was rather grounded upon the injury done to him by the Israelites, whom he dismissed in the Journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him up, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirteen, or fourteen years. Nevertheless it might so be, that when he was thus provoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learn to keep their subjects from offending Juda, for fear of endangering their own Crowns. Had Amazia desired onely recompence for the injury done to him, it is not improbable that he should have had some reasonable answer from Joas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Joas returned, likening himself to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, stuft perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobility, as might be made (according to that which Josephus hath written) between a King of ancient race and one of less Nobility than vertue.

Ios. ant. 9. c. 10.

It is by Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victory by Gods assistance, he made answer, That by Gods assistance a coward could get victory, but he would get it alone without such help: after which proud speech, though he did many valiant acts, he had small thanks, and finally, killing himself in a madness, whereinto he fell upon disgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did utter such words, I do not find, but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, he was rewarded with success accordingly. The very first counsell wherein this war was concluded, serves to prove that he was a wise Prince indeed at Jerusalem, among his Parasites, but a fool when he had to deal with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weak people, trusting more in the seat of their Countrey, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Joas, who from so poor beginnings had raised himself to such strength, that he was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained up in a long victorious war. But as Amazia discovered much want of judgment, in undertaking such a match; so in prosecuting the business, when it was set on foot, he behaved himself as a man of little experience, who having once onely tryed his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in War there was nothing else to do, than send a defiance, fight, and win. Joas on the contrary side, having been accustomed to deal with a stronger enemy than the King of Juda, used that celerity, which peradventure had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. He did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in & wasted his Countrey, but presented himself with an Army in Juda, ready to bid battel to Amazia, and save him the labour of a long journey. This could not but greatly discourage those of Juda, who (besides the impression of fear which an invasion beats into people, not inured in the like) having devoured in their greedy hopes, the spoile of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie a rate, as in the journey of Edom; were so far disappointed of their expectation that well they might suspect all new assurance of good luck, when the old had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomack enough to challenge the patrimony of Salomon, thought like another David to winne it by the sword. The issue of which fool-hardiness might easily have been fore-seen in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the quality of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the War. But meer humane wisdom, howsoever it might foresee much, could not have prognosticated all the mischief that fell upon Amazia. For as soon as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose help this wretched man had so despised, did (as Josephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the men of Juda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their King to shift for himself; which he did so ill, that his enemy had soon caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abject baseness. That the Army which fled, sustained any other loss than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Josephus, it being likely that the soon beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischief that followed this overthrow, it was Gods will that Amazia himself should sustain the whole disgrace. For Joas carried him directly to Jerusalem, where he bad him procure that the gates may be opened to let him in and his Army; threatning him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable captive, with these dreadful words, that he durst do no other than perswade the Citizens, to yeild themselves to the mercy of the Conquerour. The Town, which afterwards being in weaker state held out two years against Nebuchadnezzar, vvas utterly dismaied, when the King that should have given his life to save it, used all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Jerusalem vvere opened to Joas, vvith vvhich honour (greater than any King of Israel had ever obtained) he could not rest contented, but the more to despise Amazia and his people, he caused 400. cubits of the wall to be thrown down, and entred the City in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him as in triumph. This done, he sack'd the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so taking hostages of Amazia, he dismissed the poor creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

Joseph. Antiq. l. 9. c. 10.

A discourse of the reasons hindering Joas from uniting Juda to the Crown of Israel, when he had won Jerusalem, and held Amazia prisoner. The end of Joas his reign.

VVE may justly marvel how it came to pass, that Joas, being thus in possession of Jerusalem, having the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his own entire, could be so content to depart quietly with a little spoil, when he might have seized upon the whole Kingdom. The reign of Athalia had given him cause to hope that the issue of David might be dispossessed of that Crown; his own nobility, being the son and grand-child of Kings, together with the famous acts that he had done, were enough to make the people of Juda think highly of him; who might alſo have preferred his form of government before that of their own Kings, eſpecially at ſuch a time, when a long ſucceſſion of wicked Princes had ſmothered the thanks which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that would have enſued upon the union of all the twelve Tribes under one Prince, is ſo apparent, that I need not to inſiſt on it. That any meſſage from God forbade the Iſraelite (as afterwards in the victory which Peka the ſon of Romelia got upon Ahaz) to turn his preſent advantage to the beſt uſe, we do not read. All this makes it the more difficult to reſolve the queſtion, why a Prince ſo well exerciſed as Joas had been in recovering his own, and winning from the enemy, ſhould forſake the poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, and wilfully neglect the poſſibilities, or rather caſt away the full aſſurance of ſo fair a conqueſt, as the Kingdom of Juda.

But concerning that point, which of all others had been moſt material, I mean the deſire of the vanquiſhed people to accept the Iſraelite for their King, it is plainly ſeen, that entring Jeruſalem in triumphant manner, Joas was unable to concoct his own proſperity. For, the opening of the gates had been enough to have let him not onely into the City, but into the Royal Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by fair intreaty (eſpecially having ſure means of compulſion) he might have made his own, when they ſaw themſelves betrayed, and baſely given away by him whoſe they had been before. The fair mark which this opportunity preſented, he did not aim at, becauſe his ambition was otherwiſe, and more meanly buſied, in levelling at the glory of a triumphant entry through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwards have been corrected well enough, if entring as an enemy, and ſhewing what he could do, by ſpending his anger upon the Walls, he had within the City done offices of a friend, and laboured to ſhew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his covetouſneſs began, and ſought to pleaſe it ſelf with that which is commonly moſt ready to the ſpoyler, yet ſhould be moſt forborn. The Treaſure wherewith Seſac, Hazael, and the Philiſtims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirſt, ought not to have tempted the appetite of Joas, who though an Idolater, yet acknowledged alſo and worſhipped the eternal God, whoſe Temple was at Jeruſalem. Therefore when the people ſaw him take his way directly to ſeiſe that holy place, and lay his ravenous hands upon the conſecrated veſſels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whoſe children had hereditary charge of the treaſure) to a ſtrict account, as if they had been officers of his own exchequer; they conſidered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a noble Prince, an Iſraelite, and their brother, though of a nother Tribe. Thus following that courſe, which the moſt vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the ſame phraſe) hath wiſely avoyded; by ſtealing a few Apples, he loſt the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people deteſted him, and after the reſpite of a few days, might, by comparing themſelves one to one, perceiue his Souldiers to be no better than men of their own mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of ſo great a City. It is not ſo eaſy to hold by force a mighty town entred by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by unadviſed fear. For when the Citizens, not being diſarmed, recover their ſpirits. and begin to underſtand their firſt errour, they will think upon every advantage, of place, of proviſions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-ſtones; and rather chooſe by deſperate reſolution, to correct the evills grown out of their former cowardiſe, than ſuffer thoſe miſchiefs to poyſon the body, which in ſuch half-conqueſts, are eaſily taſted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be deſired, than the City of Florence, which through the weakneſs of Peter de Medices, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into ſuch hard tearms, that it opened the gates unto the French King Charles the eighth, who not plainly profeſſing himſelf either friend or foe to the State, entred the Town, with his Army, in triumphant manner, himſelf and his horſe armed, with his lance upon his thigh. Many inſolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell miniſtred between them and the Towns-men: ſo far forth that the Florentines, to preſerve their liberty, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intollerable conditions, demanding huge ſums of ready money, and the abſolute Seigniory of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the City in Arms. But Peter Caponi, a principal Citizen, catching theſe Articles from the Kings Secretary, and tearing them before his face, bad him ſound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bels: which peremptory words made the French bethink themſelves, and come readily to this agreement, that for forty thouſand pounds, and not half of that money to be paid in hand, Charles ſhould not only depart in peace, but reſtore whatſoever he had of their Dominion, and continue their aſſured friend. So dangerous a matter did it ſeem for that brave Army, which in few moneths after wan the Kingdom of Naples, to fight in the ſtreets, againſt the armed multitude of that populous City. It is true, that Charles had other buſineſs (and ſo perhaps had Joas, as ſhall anon be ſhewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehenſion of imminent danger that made him come to reaſon. In ſuch caſes the firing of houſes, uſually draws every Citizen to ſave his own, leaving victory to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and reſolved, women can quench, as faſt as the enemy, having other things to look unto, can ſet on fire. And indeed that Commander is more given to anger than regardful of profit, who upon the uncertain hope of deſtroying a Town, forſakes the aſſurance of a good compoſition. Diverſity of circumſtance may alter the caſe: it is enough to ſay, that it might be in Jeruſalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How ſtrongly ſoever Joas might hold himſelf within Jeruſalem, he could not eaſily depart from thence, with his booty ſafe, if the Army of Juda, which had been more terrified than weakned in the late encounter, ſhould re-enforce itſelf, and give him a check upon the way. Wherefore it was wiſely done of him, to take hoſtages for his better ſecurity, his Army being upon return, and better loaden than when it came forth; for which cauſes it was the more unapt to fight, Beſides theſe impediments, within the City and without, ſerving to cool the ambition of Joas, and keep it down from aſpiring to the Crown of Juda; it appears that ſomewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Eliſha the Prophet; who, when this Joas had ſmitten the ground with his arrows thrice, told him that he ſhould no oftner ſmite the Aramites. The three victories which Iſrael had againſt Aram, are by ſome, and with great probability, referred unto the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh yeares of Joas: after which time, if any loſſes enſuing had blemiſhed the former good ſucceſs, ill might the King of Iſrael have likened himſelf to a ſtately Cedar, and worſe could he have either lent the Judæan one hundred thouſand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the feild three hundred thouſand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plain by the words of Eliſha, that after three victories Joaſh ſhould find ſome change of fortune and ſuffer loſſe; we muſt needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed upon him this yeare, it being the laſt of his Reign. That this was ſo, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Joas his abſence gave ſuch a blow to Iſrael, as the King at his return was not able to remedie, but rather fell himſelf into new misfortunes which increaſed the calamitie; we may evidently perceive in that which is ſpoken of Jeroboam his ſon. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſaw the exceeding bitter affliction, of Iſrael, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Iſrael from under the Heaven, he preſerved them by the hand of Jeroboam the ſonne of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious Reign of Joas was concluded with a ſad cataſtrophe; the riches of the Temple haſtening his miſery and death, as they had done with Seſac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craſſus, and other ſacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived againſt him, by the people of Jeruſalem, and courage which they took to ſet upon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Army that lay abroad in the Countrey to bid him battel in open field, & recover by a new charge the honour which was loſt at the former encounter; or through the miſeries daily brought upon his own Countrey, by the Syrian in his abſence (if not by all of theſe) Joas was driven to lay aſide all thought of winning the Kingdom of Juda; and taking hoſtages for his quiet paſſage, made all haſte homewards, where he found a ſad wel-come, and being utterly forſaken of his wonted proſperity, forſook alſo his life in few moneths after, leaving his Kingdom to Jeroboam the ſecond, his fortunate and valiant ſon.

The end of Amazia his Reign and life.

ANy man is able to gheſs how Amazia looked, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted ſo much of his own great proweſs and skill in Arms, threatning to work wonders, and ſet up a-new the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now uncaſed of his Lions hide, and appeared nothing ſo terrible a beaſt as he had bin painted. Much argument of ſcoffing at him he had miniſtred unto ſuch as held him in diſlike; which at this time doubtleſs were very many: for the ſhame that falls upon an inſolent man, ſeldom fails of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazia, (beſides that the multitude are alwayes prone to lay the blame upon their Governours, even of thoſe calamities which happen by their own default) there was no child in all Jeruſalem, but knew him to be the root of all this miſchief. He had not only challenged a good man of War, being himſelf a Daſtard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had baſely pleaded for the common enemy, to have him let into the City, that with his own eyes he might ſee what ſpoil there was, and not make a bad bargain by hear-ſay. The father of this Amazia was a beaſtly man; yet when the Aramites took him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at ſo dear a rate, as the City and Temple of Jeruſalem. Had he offered, ſhould they have made his promiſe good? ſurely the haſte which they had made in condeſcending to this hard match, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Iſraelites (which was eaſie enough) any little while, they ſhould ſoon have been rid of him, ſeeing that the Aramites would have made him run home, with greater ſpeed than he came forth. Then alſo, when having truſſed up his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would have ſerved to perſwade him to leave his load behind; had not their good King delivered up hoſtages, to ſecure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his pains taken.

Such exprobations could not but vex the heart of this unhappy King: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault unto God, that had puniſhed him by all this diſhonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an idolater to the very laſt. For it is ſaid of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treaſon againſt him in Jeruſalem: a manifeſt proof that he was not reclaimed unto his lives end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his adverſity of his faults paſſed, ſhall ſooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to ſeek his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Prieſts and Prophets were leſs welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other ſide, flatterers, and ſuch as were deſirous to put a heart into him, whereof themſelves might alwayes be maſters, wanted not plauſible matter to revive him. For he was not the firſt, nor ſecond of the Kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battel. David himſelf had abandoned the City, leaving it before the enemy was in ſight, unto Abſalom his rebellious Son. Many beſides him had received loſſes, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Joas might ſo eaſily have been kept out; why did their Anceſtors let Seſac in? Aſa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his own hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excuſable by neceſſity of the State. Belike theſe traducers would commend no Actions but of dead Princes: if ſo, he ſhould rather live to puniſh them, than die to pleaſe them. Though wherein had he given them any cauſe of diſpleaſure? It was he indeed that commanded to ſet open the gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good ſervants ought not to have obeyed their Maſters Commandments to his diſadvantage, when they ſaw him not maſter of his own Perſon. As his captivity did acquit him from blame of all things that he did or ſuffered in that condition; ſo was that misfortune it ſelf, in true eſtimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loſs. For had he been as haſty to fly as others were, he might have eſcaped as well as others did. But ſeeking to teach the baſe multitude courage by his Royal example, he was ſhamefully betrayed by thoſe in whom he truſted. Unworthy creatures, that could readily obey him, when ſpeaking another mans words, being priſoner, he commanded them to yeild; having neglected his charge, when leading them into the field, he bad them ſtand to it and fight like men. The beſt was, that they muſt needs acknowledge his miſchance, as the occaſion whereby many thouſand lives were ſaved; the enemy having wiſely preferred the ſurpriſe of a Lion that was Captain, before the chaſe and ſlaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

2 Chron. 25. 27.

Theſe or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perſwade him, that it was even ſo indeed. And ſuch excuſes might have ſerved well enough to pleaſe the people, if the King had firſt ſtudied how to pleaſe God. But he that was unwilling to aſcribe unto God the good ſucceſs foretold by a Prophet; could eaſily find how to impute this late diſaſter unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it ſeems that he meant to keep himſelf ſafe from her by ſitting ſtill; for in fifteen years following (ſo long he out-lived his honour) we find not that he ſtirred. As for his ſubjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his government, yet we may ſee by his end, that the middle time was ill ſpent among them, increaſing their hatred to his own ruine. He that ſuſpecteth his own worth or other mens opinions, thinking the leſs regard is had of his perſon than he believeth to be due to his place, will commonly ſpend all the force of his authority in purchaſing the name of a

ſevere man. For the affected ſowreneſs of a vain fellow, doth many times reſemble the gravity of one that is wiſe: and the fear wherein they live, which are ſubject unto oppreſſion, carries a ſhew of reverence to him that does the wrong; at leaſt it ſerves to dazle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakeneſs of ſuch as have juriſdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well uſing it, men might attain to be ſuch as they ought, they do uſually miſ-ſpend, in ſeeking to appear ſuch as they are not. This is a vain and deceiveable courſe; procuring, in ſtead of the reſpect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous conſequence; eſpecially when an unable ſpirit, being over-perted with ſo high authority, is too paſſionate in the execution of ſuch an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazia thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, vvhat did he elſe than ſtrive to make the people think he hated them, vvhen of themſelves they vvere apt enough to believe that he did not love them? the beſt vvas, that he had, by revenging his fathers death, provided well enough for his own ſecurity: but vvho ſhould take vengeance (or upon vvhom?) of ſuch a murther, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himſelf, who had not given commandment or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in ſhedding the bloud of his Annointed. Yet as Amazia careleſs of God, was carried headlong by his own affections; ſo his ſubjects, following the ſame ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, roſe up againſt him, with ſuch headlong fury, that being unable to defend himſelf in Jeruſalem, he was driven to forſake the City, and fly to Lachis, for ſafeguard of his life. But ſo extream was the hatred conceived againſt him, and ſo general, that neither his abſence could allay the rage of it in the Capital City, nor his preſence in the Country abroad procure friends to defend his life. Queſtionleſs he choſe the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other beſt affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kill him with their own hands; for when the Conſpirators (who troubled not themſelves about raiſing an Army for the matter) ſent purſuers after, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmoſt City of his Dominion Weſtward, ſtanding ſomewhat without the border of Juda; ſo that he might have made an eaſie eſcape (if he durſt adventure) into the Territory of the Philiſtims, or the Kingdom of Iſrael. Therefore it may ſeem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town added their own treaſon to the general inſurrection; the murderers could not at ſo good leiſure as they did, have carried away his body to Jeruſalem, where they gave him burial with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Inter-regnum, or vacancy, that was in the Kingdom of Juda, after the death of Amazia.

IT hath already been ſhewed, that the Reigns of the Kings of Juda and Iſrael were ſometimes to be meaſured by compleat years, otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the laſt years of his fathers Reign, or the foremoſt of his ſons. But we are now arrived at a meer vacation, wherein the Crown of Juda lay void eleven whole years: a thing not plainly ſet down in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Joſephus, and therefore hard to be believed, were it not proved by neceſſary conſequence.

Twice we find it written, that Amazia, King of Juda, lived after the death of Joas King of Iſrael, fifteen years; whereupon it follows, that the death of Amazia, was about the end of fifteen years compleat, which Jeroboam the ſecond (who in the fifteenth year of Amazia was made King over Iſrael) had reigned in Samaria. But the ſucceſſion of Uzzia, who is alſo called Azaria, unto his father in the Kingdom of Juda, was eleven years later than the ſixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expreſſed, that Azaria began to reign in the ſeven and twentieth year of Jeroboam; the ſixteenth year of his life, being joyned with the firſt of two and fifty that he reigned. So the Inter-regnum of eleven years cannot be divided, without ſome hard means uſed, of interpreting the Text otherwiſe than the letter ſounds.

2 Chron. 25. 2. & 2 King. 14. 17.

2 King. 14. 23.

2 King. 15. 1

Yet ſome conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any void time. For it is thought that in the place laſt of all cited, by the ſeven and twentieth year of Jeroboam, we ſhould perhaps underſtand the ſeven and twentieth year of his life; or elſe (becauſe the like words are no where elſe interpreted in the like ſenſe) that Azaria was eleven years under age, that is, five years old, when his father died, and ſo his ſixteenth year might might concur with the ſeven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or that the Text it ſelf might have ſuffered ſome vvrong, by miſwriting twenty ſeven for ſeventeen years; and ſo, by making the ſeventeenth year of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be ſalved. Theſe are the conjectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the firſt of vvhich, it may ſuffice, that the Author himſelf doth eaſily let it paſs, as improbable; the laſt is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that upon every doubt, vve ſhould call the text in queſtion; vvhich could not be falſified in all copies, if perhaps it vvere in one: as for the ſecond, it may be held vvith ſome qualification, that Azaria began his Reign being five years old; but then muſt vve add thoſe eleven years vvhich paſſed in his minority, to the two and fifty that followed his ſixteenth year, vvhich is all one in a manner, vvith allowing an Inter-regnum.

But vvhy ſhould vve be ſo careful to avoid an Inter-regnum in Juda, ſeeing that the like neceſſity hath inforced all good Writers to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening vvithin few years, in the Kingdom of Iſrael? The ſpace of time between Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of Zachariah's reign, and ſuch another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hoſea, have made it eaſily to be admitted into Samaria; vvhich the conſideration of things as they ſtood in Juda, vvhen Amazia vvas ſlain, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea, although the neceſſity of computation vvere not ſo apparent.

For the publick fury having ſo far extended it ſelf, as unto the deſtruction of the Kings own perſon, was not likely to be appeaſed without order taken for obtaining ſome redreſs of thoſe matters, which had cauſed it at the firſt to break forth into ſuch extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to paſs, that they which already had thrown themſelves into ſuch an horrible treaſon, ſhould afterwards dare to withhold the Crown from a Prince of that age, which being inveſted in all ornaments of Regality, is nevertheleſs expoſed to many injuries, proceeding from head-ſtrong, and forgetful ſubjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have been King but one and forty years after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, becauſe it agrees too harſhly with the Text. The beſt opinion were that which gives unto Jeroboam eleven years of reign with his Father, before he began to reign ſingle in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not ſwallow up almoſt the whole reign of Joas, and extending the years of thoſe which reigned in Iſrael (by making ſuch of them compleat as were onely current) and take at the ſhorteſt the reigns of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not ſtand to diſpute further of this: every man may follow his own opinion, and ſee mine more plainly in the Chronological Table, drawn for theſe purpoſes.

Of Princes Contemporary with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes living with Amazia, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Joas and Jeroboam in Iſrael; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylvius Alladius, and Sylvius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Thelectus, in whoſe time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerauthæ, Amyclæ, and ſome other Towns.

But more notable than all theſe, was Aſſyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amazia, ſucceeding his father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty years, and was ſlain the laſt of the eleven void years which fore-went the reign of Azaria. In him ended (as moſt agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thouſand two hundred and forty years. A moſt luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, paſſing away his time among ſtrumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In theſe voluptuous courſes he lived an unhappy life, knowing himſelf to be ſo vile, that he durſt not let any man have a ſight of him; yet ſeen he was at length, and the ſight of him was ſo odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding means to behold the perſon of his King, was ſo incenſed with that beaſtly ſpectacle, of a man diſguiſed in womans attire, and ſtriving to counterfeit an harlot, that he thought it a great ſhame to live under the command of ſo unworthy a creature. Purpoſing therefore to free himſelf and others from ſo baſe ſubjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleſis or Beloſus a Chaldæan, who told him plainly, that the Kingdom of Sardanapalus ſhould fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleaſed with the Prophecy, did promiſe unto to Belosus himself the government of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the business, one of them stirred up the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrel, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These four Nations armed forty thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himself, but gathering such forces as he could out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that War, answer to the manner of his retiredness. For in three battels he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearful terms, that had not Belosus promised them constantly some unexpected succours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the same time, an Army out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountring it upon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces joyned themselves with his. The sudden departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Army, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through overgreat security was unprepared for resistance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his Wives brother Salamenus to keep the field, he withdrew himself into the City of Nineve; which, till new aids that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it having been prophesied, that Nineve should never be taken, till the River were enemy to the Town. Of the greatness and strength of Nineve, enough hath been spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battels overthrown the Kings Army, and slain Salamenus) was fain to lye two whole years before it, in hope to win it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seems that he wanted Engines and skill to force those walls, which were an hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Chariots in front to pass upon the rampire. But that which he could not do in two years, the River of Tigris did in the third: for being high swoln with rains, it not onely drowned a part of the City through which it ran, but threw down twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting up himself into his Palace, with his Wives, Eunuchs, and all his Treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a Monument of his, that was in Anchiale, a City of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that City and Tharsus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eat and drink, and make merry, encouraged others with verses well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue beseeming a Prince. Strab. l. 9.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more general consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greek Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be known. Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 7.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria, from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I believe that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensive, or else defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were overpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoever they did, that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and Oblivion hath oppressed them. Diod. l. 2. c. 6. Theophilus Antiochenus l. 21.

CHAP. XXIII.
Of UZZIA.

The proſperity of Uzzia, and of Jeroboam the ſecond, who reigned with him in Iſrael. Of the Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Sallum, Menahem, and Pekahia.

UZZIA, who is called Ahazia, the ſon of Jotham, was made King of Juda, when he was ſixteen years old, in the ſeven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the ſon of Joas King of Iſrael. He ſerved the God of his father David, and had therefore good ſucceſs in all his enterpriſes. He built Eloth, a Town that ſtood near to the Red Sea, and reſtored it to Juda. He overcame the Philiſtims, of whoſe Towns he diſmantled ſome, and built others in ſundry parts of their Territories. Alſo he got the maſtery over ſome parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his proſperous Wars, wherein (as Joſephus rehearſeth his acts) he began with the Philiſtims, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Army conſiſted of three hundred and ſeven thouſand men of War, over which were appointed two thouſand and ſix hundred Captains. For all this multitude the King prepared ſhields, and ſpears, and helmets, and other Arms requiſite; following therein happily a courſe quite oppoſite unto that which ſome of his late predeceſſors had held, who thought it better policy to uſe the ſervice of the Nobility, than of the multitude; carrying forth to war the Princes, and all the Chariots.

2 Chron 26 14.

2 Chron. 21.9.

As the victories of Uzzia were far more important, than the atchievments of all that had reigned in Juda, ſince the time of David; ſo were his riches and magnificent works, equal, if not ſuperiour to any of theirs that had been Kings between him and Salomon. For, beſides that great conqueſts are won to repay the charges of War with triple intereſt, he had the ſkill to uſe, as well as the happineſs to get. He turned his lands to the beſt uſe, keeping Ploughmen and Dreſſers of Vines, in grounds convenient for ſuch huſbandry. In other places he had Cattel feeding; whereof he might well keep great ſtore, having won ſo much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waſte ground ſerving for paſturage. For defence of his Cattel and Heardſmen, he built Towers in the Wilderneſs. He alſo digged many Ciſterns or Ponds. Joſephus calls them Water-courſes; but in ſuch dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the moſt likely places. If by theſe Towers he ſo commanded the water, that none could without his conſent, relieve themſelves therewith, queſtionleſs he took the onely courſe, by which he might ſecurely hold the Lordſhip over all the Wilderneſs; it being hardly paſſable, by reaſon of the extream drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the uſe of Travellers.

Beſides all this coſt, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of ſundry Towns among the Philiſtims; he repaired the wall of Jeruſalem, which Joas had broken down, and fortified it with Towers, whereof ſome were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The ſtate of Iſrael did never ſo flouriſh, as at this time, ſince the diviſion of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdoms. For as Uzzia prevailed in the South, ſo (if not more) Jeroboam the ſon of Joas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories againſt the Syrians, he wan the Royal City of Damaſcus, and he wan Hamath, with all the country thereabout from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderneſs, that is (as the moſt expound it) unto the vaſt deſarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiſcovered. So the bounds of Iſrael in thoſe parts, were in time of this Jeroboam, the ſame (or not much narrower) which they had been in the reign of David.

2 King. 14. 25. 28.

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived ſo well, for he was an Idolater: it was only the compaſſion which the Lord had on Iſrael, ſeeing the exceeding bitter affliction whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which cauſed him to alter the ſucceſſion of war, and to throw the victorious Aramites under the feet of thoſe whom they they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now again

1 Reg. 10. 13. it was invited unto repentance by new benefits, as it hath been at the beginning. But the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat was held so pretious, that neither the Kingdom it self given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politick Idolatry; nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity of Jeroboam the son of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the onely giver of victory. Wherefore the promise of God made unto Jehu, that his sons, unto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but being almost expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we who find no particulars recorded, can hardly ghess at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Jeroboam the son of Joas, after a victorious reign of one and forty years, had ended his life; it seems in all reason that Zacharia his son should forthwith have been admitted to reign in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of four Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown passed by election, must needs have appeared base; and the vertue of the last King having been so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty years did pass before Zacharia the son of Jeroboam was, by uniform consent, received as King. The true original causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calves did stand; yet second instruments of this disturbance are likely not to have been wanting upon which the wisdom of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captains of the army (who afterwards slew one another so fast, that in fourteen years there reigned five Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rend the Kingdom asunder, holding each what he could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; untill, after many years, wearied with dissention, and the principal of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeild all quietly to the son of Jeroboam. That this Anarchy lasted almost three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time between the fifteenth year of Uzzia, which was the last of Jeroboam his one and fortieth (his seven and twentieth concurring with the first of Uzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Uzzia, in the last six moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Jeroboam to have reigned with his father eleven years, do cut off the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) and by the same reason abridge this Anarchy that was before the reign of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time sufficient to prove that the Kingdom of the ten Tribes was no less distempered than as is already noted. But I choose rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtful conjecture, that gives to Jeroboam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his fathers reign unto his own; which was it self indeed so long, that he may well seem to have begun it very young; for I do not think that God blessed this Idolater both with a longer reign, and with a longer life than he did his servant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time wherein the Throne of Israel was void, before the reign of Zacharia; little may suffice to be said of his reign it self, which lasted but a little while. Six months only was he King; in which time he declared himself a worshipper of the golden Calves; which was enough to justifie the judgment of God; whereby he was slain. He was the last of Jehu's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may have been some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophesie having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended unto the utmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum, or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu for the slaughter of Jehoram, and for the eradication of Ahabs house.

Zacharia having been six moneths a King, was then slain by Sallum, who reigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. 2 King. 15. 13. What this Sallum was, I do not find; save onely that he was a Traytor, and the son of one Jabesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seems that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himself, and now when all other Competitors were sitten down, thought easily to prevail against that King, in whose person the race of Jehu was to fail. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong party: for Tiphsah or Thapsa, and the coast thereof even from Tirzah, where Menahem his enemy and sup-planter then lay, refuſed to admit, as King in his ſtead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum received the reward of his treaſon, and vvas ſlain by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the ſon of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten years. In oppoſition to Sallum, his hatred vvas deadly, and inhumane, for he not onely deſtroyed Tiphſah, and all that vvere therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, becauſe they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been uſed in revenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that he would have been as earneſt, in procuring unto him his Fathers Crown when it was firſt due. But in performing that office, there was uſed ſuch long deliberation, that we may plainly diſcover Ambition, Diſdain, and other private paſſions, to have been the cauſes of this beaſtly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it ſeems) in the beginning of his Reign, Pul, King of Aſſyria, came againſt the Land of Iſrael, whom this new King appeaſed, with a thouſand talents of ſilver, levied upon all the ſubſtantial men in his Countrey. With this money the Iſraelite purchaſed, not onely the peace of his Kingdom; but his own eſtabliſhment therein: ſome factious man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if he came uncalled) ſought to uſe his help, in depoſing this ill-beloved King. Joſephus reports of this Menahem, that his reign was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his tyranny ended with his life: and Pekahia his Son occupied his room. Joſ. ant l. 9. 11.

Of this Pekahia the ſtory is ſhort: for he reigned onely two years; at the end whereof, he was ſlain by Peka the ſon of Ramalia, whoſe treaſon was rewarded with the Crown of Iſrael, as, in time comming, another mans Treaſon againſt himſelf ſhall be. There needs no more to be ſaid of Menahem and his ſon, ſave that they were both of them Idolaters, and the ſon (as we find in Joſephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Aſſyrian King, who firſt opened unto thoſe Northern Nations the way into Palæſtina; it will ſhortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion: whether he were that Beloſus (called alſo Beleſes, and by ſome Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaces the Median, againſt Sardanapalus, or whether he were ſome other man. At the preſent it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who out-lived the happineſs wherein we left him. Joſ. ibid.

§. II.

The end of Uzzia his Reign and Life.

AS the zeal of Jehojada that godly Prieſt vvas the mean to preſerve the linage of David in the perſon of Joas, ſo it appears; that the care of holy men vvas not vvanting to Uzzia, to bring him up and advance him to the Crown of Juda, vvhen the hatred born to his Father Amazia had endangered his ſucceſſion. For it is ſaid of Uzzia, That he ſought God in the days of Zacharia (which underſtood the viſions of God) and when as he ſought the Lord, God made him proſper. 2 Chro. 26. 5.

But, when he was ſtrong, his heart was lifted up to his deſtruction: for he tranſgreſſed againſt the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incenſe upon the Altar of incenſe. Verſe 16. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by medling in the Prieſts office, vvhoſe power had in every extremity been ſo helpful to the Kings of Juda, that meer gratitude and civill policy, ſhould have held back Uzzia from incroaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had been ſilent in this caſe, and not forbidding it. Howſoever, the King forgot his duty, the Prieſts remembred theirs, & God forgat not to aſſiſt them. Azaria the high Prieſt interrupted the Kings purpoſe, and gave him to underſtand how little to his honour it vvould prove, that he took upon him the office of the ſons of Aaron. There vvere vvith Azaria fourſcore other Prieſts, valiant men, but their valour vvas ſhewed onely in aſſiſting the high Prieſt, vvhen (according to his duty) he reprehended the Kings preſumption. This was enough the reſt God himſelf performed. We find in Joſephus, that the King had apparelled himſelf in Prieſtly habit, and that he threatned Azaria and his Companions, to puniſh them vvith death, unleſs they would be quiet. Joſephus indeed inlargeth the Story, by inſerting a great Earth-quake, which did tear down half an Hill, that rowled four furlongs, till it reſted againſt another Hill, ſtopping up the high-ways, and ſpoiling the Kings Garden in the paſſage. With this Earth-quake he ſaith, that the roof of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sun-beam did light upon the Kings face, vvhich vvas preſently infected vvith leproſie. All this may have been true; and ſome there are vvho think that this Earth-quake is the ſame, vvhich is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; vvherein they do much miſ-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake ſpoken of by Amos, vvas in the days of Jeroboam King of Iſrael, vvho dyed ſeven and thirty years before Uzzia, ſo that Jotham the Joſ. ant. l. 9 c. 11.

the ſon of Uzzia, vvhich ſupplyed his Fathers place in government of the Land, ſhould, by this accompt, have been then unborn: for he vvas but five and twenty years old, vvhen he began ro reign as King. Therefore, thus far onely vve have aſſurance; that 2 Chro. 26. 20. while Uzzia was wroth with the Prieſts, the leproſie roſe up in his fore-head, before the Prieſts. Hereupon he vvas cauſed, in all haſte, to depart the place, & to live in a houſe by himſelf untill he dyed, the rule over the Kings houſe, and over all the Land, being committed to Jotham, his Son and Succeſſour. Jotham took not upon himſelf the ſtile of a King, till his Father vvas dead; vvhom they buried in the ſame field wherein his Anceſtors lay interred; yet in a Monument apart from the reſt, becauſe he was a Leper.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in ſome other Countries.

IN the time of Uzzia were the firſt of the leſſer Prophets, Hoſea, Joel, Amos, Obadia and Jonas. It is not indeed ſet down, when Joel or Obadia did prophecy but if the Prophets, whoſe times are not expreſſed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hierome's rule) with the next before them; then muſt theſe two be judged contemporary with Hoſea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of theſe five was the moſt ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at leaſt, a ſuperfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath ſo plentifully been ſought, without reprehenſion, how can he be taxed, which offers to ſearch out the antiquity of theſe holy Prophets? It ſeems to me, that the firſt of theſe, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas; who foretold the great 2 Chro. c. 24. v. 25. 26. victories of Jeroboam King of Iſrael, and therefore is like to have propheſied in the days of Joas, whileſt the afflictions of Iſrael was exceeding bitter; the Text it ſelf intimating no leſs: by which conſequence he was elder than the other Prophets, whoſe works are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdom of Iſrael are now loſt. That which remaineth of him, ſeems, not without reaſon unto ſome very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whoſe days Nineve was firſt of all deſtroyed. This Prophet rather taught Chriſt by his ſufferings, than by his writings, now extant: in all the reſt are found expreſs promiſes of the Meſſias.

In the reign of Uzzia likewiſe it was, that, Eſay, the firſt of the four great prophets, began to ſee his viſions. This difference of great and leſſer prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Auguſtine gives reaſon of the diſtinction) becauſe the greater have written larger Books. The prophet Eſay was great indeed, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the ſon of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellencie both of his ſtile and argument, wherein he ſo plainly foreteleth the Birth, Miracles, Paſſion, and whole Hiſtory of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangeliſt, as a Prophet; having written in ſuch wiſe, That (as Hierome ſaith) one would think he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Hiſtory of matters already paſt.

Hier. in præf. ſuper Iſaiam.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth year of his reign, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reaſon) was current, when Uzzia took poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Juda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Aſchis followed in the Kingdom of Egypt: unto him ſucceeded Amyſis, and theſe two occupied that Crown ſix years. Then Sabacus, an Æthiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten firſt ran along with the laſt of Uzzia his Reign and Life. Of theſe and other Egyptian Kings, more ſhall be ſpoken, when their affairs ſhall come to be intermedled with the buſineſs of Juda.

In Athens, the two laſt years of Ariphron his twenty, the ſeven and twentieth of Theſpaius, the twentieth of Agamneſtor, and the three firſt of Æſchilus his three and twenty, made even with the two and fifty of Uzzia: as likewiſe did in Alba the laſt ſeven of Silvius Aventinus his ſeven and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Silvius Procas, and two and twenty the firſt of Silvius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdom in the firſt of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twenty years, his ſon Soſarmus ſucceeded him, and reigned thirty years. Of this Arbaces, and the diviſion of the Aſſyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppreſſed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to uſe more particular diſcourſe, that we may not wander in too great uncertainty in the ſtory of the Aſſyrian Kings, who have already found the way into Paleſtina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IV.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one person, or heads of sundry Families, that reigned a part in Nineve and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly been shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent, that the chief therein was Arbaces the Medyan; to vvhom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselves in that War, but vvere contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of his power, vvas shewn upon Belosus the Babylonian, by vvhose special advice and help, Arbaces himself vvas become so great: Yet vvas not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannical a manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he used the counsel of his other Captains, and then pardoned him of his own grace; allowing him to hold not onely the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezelling vvhereof his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appears) onely the Soveraignty to himself, vvhich to use immoderately he did naturally abhor. He is said, indeed, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the City of Nineve, permitting the Citizens nevertheless to take and carry away every one his own goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of liberty; which he himself so greatly loved, that by slacking too much the reins of his own Soveraignty, he did more harm to the general estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedom, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanassar, (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) vvhom vve find in the Scriptures to have held some Towns of the Medes; and the civil administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter terms of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such as might in fourscore years, if not sooner, both extend it self unto the conquest of Israel, and tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not onely in regard of the destruction of Nineve, and subversion of the Assyrian Kingdom, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seem at that time to have kept the Assyrians under their subjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nineve, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made uncertain.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it, I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a-part the severall authorities and arguments of sundry men, adding somwhat of weight, or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will doe as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine own, but meerly led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appear weak.

That which, until of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belosus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palæstina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally that he reigned eight and fortie years, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat-phalassar his son, in whose Posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proof, could not be gainsaid; for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoever Annius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that wee should conclude all to be false which they affirme.

They

They, who maintaine this Tradition, juſtifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumſtances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no hiſtorie at all. For it is manifeſt by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Beloſus were partners in the action againſt Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewiſe other Captains were with governments: but that any third perſon was ſo eminent, as to haue Aſſyria it ſelfe, the cheiſe Countrey of the Empire beſtowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the leaſt appearance is found in any Hiſtorie. And certainly it ſtood with little reaſon, that the Aſſyrians ſhould be committed unto a peculiar King, at ſuch time as it was not meet to truſt them in their own walls and houſes. Rather it is apparent, that the deſtruction of Nineve by Arbaces, and the tranſplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy, becauſe thereby the people of that Nation might be kept down from aſpiring to recover the Soveraignty, which elſe they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the Seat of the Empire.

Upon ſuch conſiderations did the Romans, in ages long after following, deſtroy Carthage and diſſolve the Corporation, or Body politick, of the Citizens of Capua; becauſe thoſe two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter eſteemed over-dangerous, even to Rome it ſelfe, that was Miſtreſſe of them both. This being ſo, how can it be thought that the Aſſyrians in three or foure years had erected their Kingdome a-new, under one Pul? or what muſt this Pul have been (of whoſe deſervings or entermedling, or indeed of whoſe very name, we find no mention in the Warre againſt Sardanapalus) to whom the principall parts of the Empire fell either by generall conſent in diviſion of the Provinces, or by his owne power and purchaſe very ſoon after? Surely he was none other than Beloſus; whoſe neer neighbourhood gave him opportunity (as he was wiſe enough to play his own game) both to get Aſſyria to himſelf, and to empeach any other man that ſhould have attempted to ſeize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Beloſus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches and power, as good as the third part of the Perſian Empire, was able to furniſh him with all that was requiſite for ſuch a buſineſs: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his own hands all the gold and ſilver that had been in the Palace of Nineve. And queſtionleſs, to reſtore ſuch a City as Nineve, was an enterpriſe fit for none to take in hand, except he had ſuch means as Beloſus had, which Pul, if he were not Beloſus, is likely to have wanted.

Beſides all this, had Pul been a diſtinct perſon from Beloſus, and Lord of Aſſyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Meſopotamia, it would not have been an eaſie matter for him, to paſs quite through another mans Kingdom with an Army, ſeeking booty a far off in Iſrael: the onely action by which the name of Phul is known. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the ſame whom prophane writers have called Beloſus, Beleſes, and Beleſtis (in like manner as Joſephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called never otherwiſe than Darius the Mede, was the ſon of Aſtiages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxeres) then is this ſcruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Meſopotamia did border upon Syria and Palæſtina: ſo that Beloſus having ſettled his affairs in Aſſyria towards the Eaſt and North, might with good leiſure encroach upon the Countries that lay on the other ſide of his Kingdom, to the South and Weſt. He that looks into all particulars, may find every one circumſtance concurring, to prove that Phul, who invaded Iſrael, was none other than Beloſus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no ſmall part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrown, did enter into that action, meerly for the love of Beloſus. The friendſhip of theſe Arabians was a thing of main importance, to thoſe that were to paſs over Euphrates with an Army into Syria. Wherefore Beloſus, that held good correſpondence with them, and whoſe moſt fruitfull Province, adjoyning to their barren quarters, might yearly do them ineſtimable pleaſures, was not only likely to have quiet paſſage through their borders, but their utmoſt aſſiſtance: yea, it ſtands with good reaſon, that they who loved not Iſrael, ſhould for their own behoofe have given him intelligence of the deſtructions and civil broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Pul got a thouſand talents, ſo it ſeems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavy neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their own, ſetting up a new King in Damaſco, and clearing the coaſt of Arabia (from the Sea of the Wilderneſs to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garriſons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, divided by Euphrates, hold together in ſo good terms of friendſhip: it was ancient conſanguinity, the memory whereof was availeable to the Syrians,

Joſ. Ant. l. 10 c. 12.

in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the river came over willingly, to the ſuccour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damaſco. So Beloſus had good reaſon to look into thoſe parts: what a King reigning ſo far off as Nineve, ſhould have to do in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdom had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to ſhew.

But concerning this laſt argument of the buſineſs which might allure the Chaldæans into Palæſtina, it may be doubted, leſt it ſhould ſeem to have ill coherence with that which hath been ſaid of the long Anarchy that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crown of Iſrael were worn by no man in three and twenty years, then is it likely that Beloſus was either unwilling to ſtir, or unable to take the advantage when it was faireſt and firſt diſcovered. This might have compelled thoſe, who alone were not ſtrong enough to ſeek after help from ſome Prince that lay further off; and ſo the opinion of thoſe that diſtinguiſh Phul from Beloſus, would be ſomewhat confirmed. On the other ſide, if we ſay, that Beloſus did paſs the river of Euphrates, as ſoon as he found likelihood of making a proſperous journey, then may it ſeem that the inter-regnum in Iſrael was not ſo long as we have made it: for three and twenty years leiſure would have afforded better opportunity, which ought not to have been loſt.

For anſwer, hereunto we are to conſider, what Oroſius and Euſebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they layd hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it be held an errour of Oroſius, where he ſuppoſeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldæans was in a manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Euſebius do concur, that the authoriry of Arbaces did reſtrain the ambition, which by his abſence grew bold, and by his death, regardful onely of it ſelf. Now, though ſome have conjectured that all Aſſyria was given to Beloſus (as an overplus, beſides the Provinces of Babylon which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deſervings; yet the opinion more commonly received, is, that he did onely incroach upon that Province by little and little, whileſt Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himſelfe. Seeing therefore, that there paſſed but twelve years between the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Reign; manifeſt it is, that the conqueſt of Aſſyria, and ſettling of that Countrey, was work enough to hold Beloſus occupyed, beſides the reſtauration of Nineue, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his reign, if perhaps he lived to ſee it finiſhed in his own days. So that this argument may rather ſerve to prove that Phul and Beloſus were one perſon, foraſmuch as the journey of Phul againſt Iſrael was not made until Beloſus could find leiſure; and the time of advantage which Beloſus did let ſlip, argued his buſineſs in ſome other quarter, namely, in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be ſaid, that he who conquered Aſſyria, and performed ſomewhat upon a Country ſo far diſtant as Palæſtina, was likely to have been, at leaſt, named in ſome Hiſtory, or, if not himſelf, yet his Country to have been ſpoken of for thoſe victories: but we neither hear of Phul, in any prophane Author; neither doth any Writer, ſacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatſoever of the Aſſyrians, done in thoſe times; whereas of Beloſus, and the power of the Chaldæans, we find good Record.

Surely, that great ſlaughter of ſo many thouſand Aſſyrians, in the quarrel of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate war, which overwhelmed the whole Country, ending but with the ruine and utter deſolation of Nineve, muſt needs have ſo weakened the ſtate of Aſſyria, that it could not in thirty years ſpace be able to invade Palæſtina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Nineve, had, in all their greatneſs, forborn to attempt. Yet theſe afflictions, diſabling that Countrey, did help to enable Beloſus to ſubdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (eſpecially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interpoſition of that Countrey, ſecure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that ſide, might very well turn Southward, and try his fortune in thoſe Kingdoms, whereinto civill diſſention of the inhabitants, and the bordering envy of the Arabians and Aramites about Damaſco, Friends and Couſins to the Chaldæans and Meſopotamians, did invite him. For theſe, and the other before alledged reaſons, it may be concluded, That what is ſaid of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be underſtood of Beloſus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaſhaſht, and Ahaſhueroſh, with the like, are thought, or known, to be meant the ſame whom prophane Hiſtorians, by names better known in their own Countreys, have called called Nabopollaſſer, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: eſpecially conſidering, that hereby we ſhall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, or need to trouble our ſelves or others with framing new conjectures, This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themſelves eaſily follow. For it is a matter of no great conſequence to know the truth of this point (conſidering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Beloſus, or ſome other man: the whole race of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found thoſe famous Princes, Nabonaſſar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollaſſar (famous for the Aſtronomicall obſervations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Beloſus or Beleſes were that Phul which invaded Iſrael; if he and his poſterity reigned both in Nineve and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Aſer, from whom Salmanaſar, Senacherib, and Aſarhaddon deſcended; then it is manifeſt, that we muſt ſeek Nabonaſſar the Babylonian King, among thoſe Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanaſar, who is known to have reigned in thoſe years which Ptolomy the Mathematician hath aſſigned unto Nabonaſſar. As for Merodech, who ſupplanted Aſar-haddon, manifeſt it is, that he and his ſucceſſors were of another houſe. This is the ſcope and end of all his diſputation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be ſatisfied with ſuch conjectures. They lay hold upon the concluſion, and by ſhaking that into peices, hope to overthrow all the premiſſes upon which it is inferred. For (ſay they) if Nabonaſſar that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanaſar, or any of thoſe other Aſſyrian Kings, then it is manifeſt that the races were diſtinct, and that Phul and Beloſus were ſeverall Kings. This conſequence is ſo plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabonaſſar was a diſtinct perſon from Salmanaſſar, are brought ſuch arguments as would ſtagger the reſolution of him that had ſworn to hold the contrary. For firſt, Nabonaſſar was King of Babylon, and not of Aſſyria. This is proved by his name, which is meerly Chaldean, whereas Salman, the firſt part of Salmanaſſars name, is proper to the Aſſyrians.

It is likewiſe proved by the Aſtronomicall obſervations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Aſſyrians, do ſhew that Nabonaſſar, from whom Ptolomy draws that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Aſſyrian. Thirdly, and more ſtrongly, it is confirmed by the ſucceſſor of Nabonaſſar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his own language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more breifly in Eſay his prophecie, Merodac by the former Part of his name; or Merodach Baladan the ſon of Baladan. Now if Merodach the ſon of Baladan King of Babel, were the ſonne of Nabonaſſar, then was Nabonaſſar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanaſſar King of Aſſyria. Eſay 39. 1.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of theſe two names, Nabonaſſar and Salmanaſſar, which in Greek or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanaſſar carried captive ſome part of the ten Tribes, it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon, Salmanaſſar had gotten ſomewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it ſelfe. To conclude, Merodach began his reign over Babylon in the ſixt year of Hezikia, at which time Salmanaſſar took Samaria; therfore if Salmanaſſar were King of Babylon, then muſt we ſay that he and Merodach, yea, and Nabonaſſar, were all one man. Theſe are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joſeph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofes from matter of more neceſſary inference.

Touching all that was ſaid before of Phul Beloſus, for the proving that Phul and Beloſus were not ſundry Kings; Joſeph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have ſpent their labour to ſo little purpoſe. Honeſt and painfull men he confeſſeth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, given ſuch offences that men refuſed thereupon to read their Bookes and Chronologies. A ſhort anſwer.

For mine own part, howſoever I beleeve nothing that Annius his Beroſus, Metaſthenes, and others of that ſtamp affirm, in reſpect of their bare authority; yet am I not ſo ſqeamiſh, but that I can well enough digeſt a good Book, though I find the names of one or two of theſe good fellows alledged in it: I have (ſomewhat peradventure to often) already ſpoken my mind of Annius his Authors: Nevertheleſſe, I may ſay here again, that where other Hiſtories are ſilent, or ſpeak not enough, there may we without ſhame borrow of theſe, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we find, and serveth to explain or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are those honest and painful men (as Scaliger terms them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellows) who set down the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belosus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though disliking him in general) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doors with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force as cannot either be resisted or avoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaligers reasons be enough to prove. For though Nabonassar be a Chaldæan name, and Salmanassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders us from believing that one man in two languages might be called by two several names? That Astronomy flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonassar either an Astrologer or a Chaldæan. So it is, that Scaliger himself calls them. Prophetas nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their sleep have dreampt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Scal Canon l 3.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the negative: But as his being Lord over the Chaldæans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their sciences; so doth it not prove him not to have been also King of Assyria. The Emperour Charles the fift, who was born in Gant, and Philip his Son, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men far more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I think, Posterity will not use this as an argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar did use the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholars; but it seems, that he and his posterity, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazzard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two unanswerable arguments, (as Scaliger terms them, being me-thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alledged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawn from the unlike sound and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likeness of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted, which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it self: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing save conjecture. But in that which is alledged out of the Prophet Esay concerning Merodach the son of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, and Mardokenpadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar and his beginning to reign in the sixt year of Hezekia, I find matter of more difficulty, than can be answered in hast. I will therefore defer the handling of these objections untill I meet with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach lived, and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scruple in the mind of the Reader, thus far will I here satisfie him; that how strong soever this argument may seem, Scaliger himself did live to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the son of Nabonassar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us consider, in what sort they have fashioned their Story, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belosus or Belesis, have in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to fail in Asarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confess my want of Books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present unto us the body of this History, in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have seen, that since Joseph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have written in favour of some one or other point thereof: but Sethus Calvisius himself, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Work, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been careful to give us notice, how long Belosus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulassar did reign, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set down Baladan, for the same same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himself revoked. In this case therefore I must lay down the plot of these divided Kingdoms, in such sort as I find it conceived by Augustinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I have seen, sets down the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posterity, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clark of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the last year; he appears to me a man of a curious industry, sound judgment, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetful of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Books he hath received good information, and enriched his works by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this business he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose help, without wrong or dishonour to himself, he hath both used and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not spare to do right unto Torniellus; but confess my self to have received benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annals had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed me in some things, so would he have instructed and imboldened me to write more fully and less timerously in other things, which now I have no leisure to revise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared lest it had over-hastily passed out of my hand, and been exposed to other mens constructions) of the four Kings c.1. sect.13. that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were slain by Abraham, I find him adventuring as I have done, to say, that they may probably be thought to have been some petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let us consider how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces, being the most mighty, sought to get all to himself, but was opposed by Belosus; in which contention, one Phul a powerful man in Assyria, sided with Belosus, and they two prevailed so far, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire between Octavian, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himself Soveraign Lord of all, and placed the seat of his Empire in Media, appointing Belosus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in four years, it came to pass by the just judgment of God, that Phul and Belosus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and instead of being Vice-Roys, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Torniellus himself leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposing, resolving to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to ghess. Having thus devised how Phul and Belosus might at the first, attain to be Kings, he orders their time and their successors in this manner.

Four years after Arbaces, Phul begins to reign, and continues eight and forty years. Theglatphalasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diversly, according to the Authors whom I have in hand are pleased to diversifie them) succeeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Senacherib reigned seven: and when he was slain, Asarhadden his son ten years; in whom that line failed.

The same time that Phul took upon him as King of Assyria, or not long after (why not rather afore? for so it had been more likely) Belosus usurped the Kingdom of Babylon, and held it threescore and eight years; at the least threescore and eight years did pass, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baladan, are assigned six and twenty years: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: four and twenty to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twenty to Nabolassar the father of Nebuchodonosor; who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the original of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdoms, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belosus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more nearly resembling the truth. Neither do I think, that Torniellus would have conceived two different waies, by which Phul might have gotten Assyria (for how Belosus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the sudden King of Assyria; or to give him so noble a Province, as would, of it self, invite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most unlikely to have happened, unless his deserts(whereof we find no mention) had been proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he devised the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul being one of the three that divided all betweene them, was utterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this division it selfe, and the civill Warres that caused it, were never heard of? Questionlesse; the enterverting of some treasures by Belosus, with his Judgment, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see,how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoyded; but that either we must confesse the Dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his merits;or else his merits, and name withall, to have been strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us thinke, that rather the conjecture,inferring such a sequel, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul,and Belosus, against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recover such strength in foure years, as might serve to hold out in rebellion: for Belosus it was needlesse to rebell, considering,that Arbaces did not seek to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an over-great favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were vnder his own Government, to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that we peruse the Catalogue of these Kings; not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their own times) but speaking of their order and time in generall. If it be soe unlawfull to think, that some of Annius his tales(let them all be counted his tales,which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may be true, especially such as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood; why then is it said, that Phul did reign in Assyria eight and forty years? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true that painful and judicious Writers have found this number of years to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them took it from Annius.Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgery (as questionles he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tels truth, or probability, he be not believed for his own sake; though for our own sakes we make use of his boldnes, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are unwilling our selves to be Authors of new, though not unprofitable conjectures. Herein we shall have this commodity, that we may without blushing after a little, to help our own opinions,and lay the blame upon Annius, against whom we shall be sure to find friends that will take our part.

The reigns of Theglathalasar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of five and twenty years the one, and seventeen the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and seven from the latter of them,to fit(as I think) his own computation; using the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, save our good Metasthenes,or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reign,it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Asarhaddon,Torniellus gives the same length of reign, which is found in Metasthenes, I think there are not many, that will arrogate so much unto themselves,as may very well be allowed unto a man so judicious as is Torniellus: and yet I could wish that he had forborn to condemn the followers of Annius in this busines, wherein he himself hath chosen, in part,rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we find that he used in the measuring the reigns of the Chaldæans, filling up all the space between the end of Sardanapalus and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threescore and eight years of Belosus. In this respect it was,perhaps,that he thought Belosus might have begun his reign somewhat later than Phul: for threescore and eight years would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdom,that was no young man when he took possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his reign, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time,as were alone without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver? Indeed eight and forty years had been somewhat of the most, considering that he seems by the story to have been a little less at such time as he joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty years, did well deserve that note (which Torniellus advisedly gives) that if his reign extended not so far,then the reign of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, unto Nabonassar.

I neither do reprehend the boldnes of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modesty of Scaliger and Sethus Calvisius,in forbearing to set down as warrantable, such things as depend onely upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by Antiquity,must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countreys, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of Load-stone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remedilesse oblivion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith.

——Neque fervidis
Pars inclusa caloribus
Mundi, nec Boreæ finitimum latus,
Duratæque sole Niues,
Mercatorem abigunt; horrida callidi
Vincunt æquora Navitæ,

Nor Southern heat, nor Northern Snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subjects Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
The subtile Shipmen way to find,
Storm never so the Seas with Wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serve only to mis-lead such discoverers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curses or well deserved scorn; but to keep their owne credit, they cannot serve alwayes. To which purpose I remember a pretty jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish gentleman, who had been imployed by his King in planting a Colony upon the Streights of Megellan: for when I asked, him being then my Prisoner, some questions about an Island in those Streights, which, me thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merily, that it was to be called the Painters wives Iland; saying, That whilest the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired to put in one Countrey for her; that she in imagination, might have an Island of her own. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we need not be soe scrupulous, For it is not to be feared, that time shall runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: What if some good Copy of any ancient Author, could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties? would it be more shame to have believed in the mean while, Annius or Torniellus, than to have believed nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit which we gave to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius, yet him than them, of his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seems to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions as have once gotten the credit of being general, so to deal as Pacuvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the City to death. He lockt the Senators up within the Statehouse, and offered the lives of the Peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, untill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hasty; for as fast as every name was read, all the town cryed, Let him dye: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the person, or baseness of his condition, or sufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: so that finding the worse and less choice, the further and the more that they sought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After the division of the Assyrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reign of the same King Uzzia and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the general opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Jotham: yet is not that opinion so general, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not be too careful of drawing the Hebrews to those works of time, which had no reference to their affairs, it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accounts, we joyn them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured measured the length of the race by his own foot; by which Pythagoras found out the state and likely strength of Hercules his body. They took name, not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the City Olympia, otherwise Pisa, near unto Elis; where also Jupiter's Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the Wonders of the World, was known by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth year compleat, in the plains of Elis, a City of Peloponesus, near the River Alpheus.

Aul Gell. l. 1 ex Plut. Plut. out of Hermippus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many years, till Iphitus, by advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Licurgus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reign of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times and their stories to be certain: but reckoned all before, either doubtful or fabulous: and yet Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reign of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Castor, Polybius, and others, hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Solon had speech with Crœsus, and Crœsus was overthrown and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true year of the World, and the reign of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian and Dydimus begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Osias, or Azariah.

Eusebius, who is contrary to himself in this reckoning, accounts with those that find the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundreth and sixth year after Troy; yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzziah, which is (as I find it) two years later.

Euseb. de Præp. Evang. l. 10. c. 3.

Eratosthenes placeth the first Olympiad four hundred and seven years after Troy, reckoning the years that passed between; to whom Dionysius, Halicarnassæus, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

Eratosth. apud. Clem. Alex. Strom l. 1.

The distance between the destruction of Troy and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratosthenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his posterity into Peloponnesus, were fourscore years; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore years; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight years. In this account the first year of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were to seek the beginning of the Olympiads by numbring the years from the taking of Troy, which is of date far more uncertain. Let it suffice that by knowing the instauration of these games to have been in the four hundreth and eight year current after Troy, we may reckon back to the taking of that City, setting that, and other accidents which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads must needs teach us how to find when they began.

To this good use we have the ensuing years unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the same Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth fourscore and seventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, eight and forty years; forwards to the victory of Lysander, seven and twenty; to the battel of Leuctra, thirty four; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole sum ariseth to 453. years; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzzia, we have arguments grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reign, and the death of Alexander; as also upon the Astronomical calculation of sundry Eclipses of the Sun; as of that which happened when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reign as King before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he reigned thirty years: they who give him but twenty nine years of reign (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Justin, Eusebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers in the first year of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This latter note of Alexanders death serveth well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations do. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, ander, we shal find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads; wherein Cyrus began his reign, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdoms) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirty years compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seven years, we find compleat two hundred and seven years, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth year from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seventy years of the captivity of Juda, and desolation of the Land of Israel: manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seventy years, and one hundred threescore, and ten years more, the last which passed under the Kings of Juda, to find the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Uzziah, as we have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serve well to the same purpose. For examples sake; that which was seen when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundred threescore and seventh year of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a fair way through the threescore and ten years, unto the destruction of Jerusalem; and so upwards through the reigns of the last Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth year of Uzzia.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece, they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Mastery in those feats, whereof there was good use, but in running of Chariots, fighting with whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exercises that served only for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable quality, to make tryal of their skill. Yea, the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour of having plaid the best part.

The Eleans were presidents of those Games, whose justice, in pronouncing without partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palm, or Olive, without any other commodity following than the reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seen his three sons crowned for their several victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in cœlum ascensurus es, that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou shalt not clime up to heaven: as if there could be no greater happiness on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Quos Elæa domum reducit
Palma Cœlestes.

Such as like heavenly wights do come
With an Elæan Garland home. Horat. Carm. l. 4. Ode. 2.

Neither was it only the voyce of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had won these Olympian prizes; but even grave Historians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour to have won the victory at Running or wrestling in those games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous victory, or conquest of a Province. Tull. in Orat. pro Flacco.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moon; and upon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombæan, which doth answer to our June; and what means they used to make the Moneth begin with the new Moon, that the fifteenth day might be the full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the Kings of Juda, and leave the merry Greeks at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious imployments, when the Persian quarrels draw the body of the History into the coasts of Ionia and Hellespont.

§. VI.
Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

JOtham the sonne of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty years old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple of threescore cubits upright, and therefore called Ophel: besides divers Cityes in the 2 King. 15. 33.

Hills

Hills of Judæ, and in the Forrest, Towers and Palaces: he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundred talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: he reigned six and twenty years: of whom Josephus gives this testimonie: Ejusmodi verò Princeps hic fuit, ut nullam in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo Pie coluerit, hominibus suis adeo juste prefuerit, urbem ipsam tantæ sibi curæ esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, ut universum regnum hostibus quidem minimè contemnendum, domesticis autem ejus incolis atque civibus fœlix, faustum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; This was such a Prince, as a man could find no kind of vertue wanting in him: he worshipped God so religiously, he governed his men so righteously, he was so provident for the City, and did so greatly amplify it, that by his vertue and proweſs he made his whole Kingdom not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his reign was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himself was devout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelesteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which governed from year to year. And yet Pausanias in his second book with Strabo & Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacidæ, to the time of Cypselus, who drove them out.

Teglathphalassar, or Teglathpeleser, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murthered his master Pekeiah) was King thereof. In which expedition he took most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galilee, with those of Gilead over Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captive. This Tiglath reigned five and twenty years, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzhemius finds, that with his son Salmanassar he reigned yet two years longer; which years I would not ascribe to the son, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his single reign, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himself, who therewith reigned 27. years.

Æschylus, the son of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. years. Alcamenes governed Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius. But therein surely Eusebius is mistaken: for Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witness the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. years, and out-lived the Messeniack war: which was ended by Theopompus, the son of Nicander, his royal companion.

Paus. l. 3.

At this time lived Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the city of Nineve, which succeeded (saith Josephus) a hundred and fifteen years after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

AHas, or Achaz, succeeded unto Jotham in the seventeenth year of Peka, the son of Remalia: the same being also the last year of his fathers reign, who began in the second of the same Peka, and reigned 16. but not compleat years. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his son for sacrifice before the Idol Moloch, or Saturn which was represented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a Calfe, set up not far from Jerusalem, in a valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is used for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkass of this Idol, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noise of Cimbals, and other Instruments, filled the air, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not be heard: which unnatural, cruel, and divillish Oblation, Jeremy the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sin was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuternomy, it is called an abhomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judæa, divers Authors witness; as Virgil in the second of Æneids—— Sanguine Placastis, &c. and Silvius—— Poscere cæde Deos. Saturn is said to have brought this custom into Italy; besides the casting of many souls into the River of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men should be thrown in and drowned. The Devil also taught the Carthaginians this kind of butchery, insomuch, that when their City was besieged, and in distress, the Priest made them believe, that because they had spared their own children, and had bought and brought up others to be offered, that therefore Saturn had stirred up and strengthened their Enemies

Enemies againſt them: whereupon they preſently cauſed two hundred of the nobleſt youths of their City to be ſlain, and offered to Saturn or Satan, to appeaſe him: who beſides theſe forenamed Nations, had inſtructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Meſſena, of Galatia, with the Maſſagetes, and others, in theſe his ſervices. Further, as if he were not content to deſtroy the ſoules of many Nations in Europe, Aſia, and Africa, (as Acoſta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Devil under this fearful ſervitude, in which he alſo holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

Acoſt de Hiſtor. nat. & mor. Ind.

For the wickedneſſe of this King Ahaz, God ſtirred up Rezen of Damaſcus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliah, King of Iſrael againſt him, who invaded Judæa, and beſieged Jeruſalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, poſſeſt himſelf of Elah by the Red Sea, and caſt the Jewes out of it; and Pekah ſlaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thouſand Judæans, of the ableſt of the Kingdome, at which time Maaſeiah, the Sonne of Achaz, was alſo ſlaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Governor of his houſe, and Elcanath the ſecond perſon unto the King. Beſides all this, two hundred thouſand priſoners of women and children, the Iſraelites lead away to Samaria: but by the counſell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and delivered back again.

2 Chron. 28. 6.

As Iſrael and Aram vexed Juda on the North, ſo the Edomites and the Philiſtims, who evermore attended the ruine of Judæa, entred upon them from the South, and took Bethſemes, Ajalon, Gaderoth, Shocho, Timnah, and Gemzo, ſlew many people, and carried away many priſoners. Whereupon when Achaz ſaw himſelf environed on all ſides, and that his Idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, he ſent to the Aſſyrian Tiglathpileſer, to deſire ſome aid from him againſt the Iſraelites and Aramites, preſenting him with the ſilver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings houſe.

2 Kings. 16.

Tiglathpileſer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the trouble that roſe in Paleſtina. His Father having lately made himſelf from a Provincial Leiutenant, King of Babylon and Aſſyria, had a little before led him the way into Judæa, invited by Menahem, King of Iſrael. Wherefore now the Son willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himſelf, he was content to aſſign ſome other time for going through with this enterprize: becauſe (as I have ſaid before) he was not firmly ſettled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet ſtrong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treaſures of Jeruſalem, prepared his Army, firſt invaded the Territory of Damaſcus, wan the City, and killed Rezin the laſt of the race of the Adads, who began with David, & ended with this Achaz. At Damaſcus, Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a pattern of the Altar, ſent it to Uriah the Prieſt, commanding the like to be made at Jeruſalem, whereon at his return he burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the mean while Tiglath poſſeſt all Baſan, and the reſt beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manaſſe. And then paſſing the River, he maſtered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdom of Iſrael, and made them his Vaſſals. And notwithſtanding that he was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the ſpoil of Iſrael, he poſſeſt himſelf of the greater part of Juda, and, as it ſeemeth, inforced Achaz to pay him tribute. For in the ſecond of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Aſſur, or rebelled againſt him, and therefore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and born theſe miſeries, in the end of the ſixteenth year of his reign he died; but was not buried in the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda.

With Ahaz lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed 40. years, ſaith Euſebius: Diodorus and Cteſius find Anticarmus inſtead of this Medidus, to have been Soſarmus his ſucceſſor, to whom they give 50. years.

Euſeb. in Chron.

Tiglath Pileſer held the Kingdom of Aſſyria, all the reign of Ahaz: yet ſo, that Salmanaſſar his Son may ſeem to have reigned with him ſome part of the time. For we find that Ahaz did ſend unto the Kings of Aſhur to help him. The Geneva note ſays, that theſe Kings of Aſhur, were Tiglath Pileſer, and thoſe Kings that were under his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made ſuch conqueſts, as might give him the Lordſhip over other Kings, I do neither find any Hiſtory, nor circumſtance that proveth. Wherefore I think that theſe Kings of Aſhur, were Tiglath, and Salmanaſſar his Son, who reigned with his Father, as hath been ſaid before: though how long he reigned with his Father, it had been hard to define.

2 King 16.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedæmon, a hundred and thirty years after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Euſebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of theſe Ephori, Elalus was the firſt; Theopompus and Polydorus being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen every year, were controllers, as well of their Senators, as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Ahaz died Æschylus, who had ruled in Athens ever since the fiftieth year of Uzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontidæ, or Governours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Æschylus, and was the last of their Governors: he ruled only two years. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Governors for life; which ending in this Alcemenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burgho-Master, or Governour of their City for ten years.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Book begins in the first year of the eight Olympiad, Eusebius and Halicarnassæus in the first of the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeed, Carops the first of these, began his ten years rule.

The Kingdom of the Latines, governed about three hundred year by the Silvii, of the race of Æneas, took end in the same Ahaz time: the foundation of Rome being laid by Romulus and Remus in the eighth year of the same King, Codoman builds it in the eleventh of Achaz. Bucholzer in the eighth, as I think he should; others somewhat later, and in the reign of Ezechias, Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others square the time of the foundation to the third year of the sixt Olympiad. But Halicarnassæus, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first year of the seventh; who seem not only to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best account.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the Antiquity of Italy, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

§. I.

Of the Inhabitants, and the name of Italy.

AND here to speak of the more ancient times of Italy, and what Nations possest it before the arrival of Æneas, the place may seem to invite us: the rather because much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italy before the fall of Troy, was known to the Greeks by divers names; as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the seat, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it; one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotrii, whom Halicarnassæus, thinks to have been the first that brought a Colony of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italy of Italus; concerning which changes of names, Virgil speaks thus:

Halicarn. lib. 1.

Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt,
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere gleba:
Oenotrii coluere viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greeks Hesperia name,
Ancient, and strong, of much fertility:
Oenotrians held it, but we hear by fame,
That by late ages of Posterity,
'Tis from a Captains name call'd Italy.

Who this Captain or King may have bin, it is very uncertain. For Virgils speaks no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long upon the whole Country, and worn out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to find out the original of this name, and the first planters of this noble Country, Reyneccius hath made a very painful search, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds upon that of Halicarnassæus, who speaks of a Colony which the Eleans did lead into Italy, before the name of Italy was given to it; Secondly, upon that of Justine, who saith, that Brundusium was a Colony of the Ætolians; Thirdly, upon that of Strabo, who affirms the same of Temesa or Tempsa, a City of the Brutii in Italy; Lastly, upon the authority of Pliny, who shews that the Italians did inhabit onely one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was derived over all. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Ætolians who who (as he shews) had one original; from them he brings the name of Italy. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, save that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greek words is common; and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Ætholia an Island near Italy, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolic Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach.

Hereunto appertains that of Julian the Apostata, who called the Greeks cousins of the Latines. Also the common Original of the Greeks and Latines from Javan; and the Fable of Janus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italy lay, and was stamped on Coins, with a Ship on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Javan, father of the Greeks and Latines; who sayling over the Ionian Sea, that lyes between Ætolia and the Western parts of Greece and Italy, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinks, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, & thereto applyes that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seem strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilest he abode in Italy with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproved. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the son of Javan, and Nephew of Japheth, the eldest son of Noah: which antiquity far exceeds the the name of Italy, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the War of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speaks of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italy, but calleth Electra and her sister Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountain in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italus been one person.

As for the authority of Berosus in this case, we need the less to regard it, for that Reyneccius himself, whose conjectures are more to be valued than the dreams wherewith Annius hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italy began long after Atlas, it appears by the verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein he would not have said,

——Nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse ducis de nomine gentem, had that name been heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey, But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few years before the War of Troy, had left in Italy a Colony of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italy began: and seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldness to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not that I have read of any such Greek as was named Italus; yet the name of Ætolus written in Greek Aitolus, was very famous among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being son of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdom. Neither is it more hard to derive the name of Italus from Ætolus, than Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgil's authority stand well with the collections of Reyneccius; the name of Italy being taken both from a Captain, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

§. II.

Of the Aborigenes, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italy the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italy, and in a few ages whatsoever Nation was known in Europe: together with all the Western parts of Asia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassæus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) think to have bin Arcaians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as Original, or Native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to have always usurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the Moon; because indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus inforced to forsake their seats so oft as other Greeks were, who did dwell without that halfe Island, neither had the Arcadians so unsure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Countrey was less fruitfull in land, mountainous, and hard of access, and they themselves

(as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselves Aborigenes, in that language, which either their new Seat, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt somewhat farr from the Sea, and are alwaies noted as unapt men to prove good Mariners, should have bin Authors of new discoveries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulnesse of children, in which those ages abounded, inforced the superfluous company to seek another seat, & that some expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Evander, into the same parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigenes, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glory such in Italy, as could long sustaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Ausones, Arunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some civility; and he therefore cannonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others term him Stercutius, and say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium took his name of Saturn, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is questionless a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fled from another; so in the truth of History, it is well known, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it shonld be hard to find one Countrey or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit, And yet, as most fables and poeticall fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkly expresse (for so they feigned a passage over a River in Hell, because death is a passage to another life: and because this passage is hateful, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the River Styx, of hate; Cocytus of lamentation, and Acheron, of Pain: so also because men are stonie-hearted; and beeause the Greek λαοὶ, people, and λᾶες, stones, are neer in sound, therefore they feigned in the time of Ducalion stones converted into men, as at other times men into stones:) in like manner it may be, that the original of Saturus hiding himself was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Acts; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus abdens te. For it cannot be in vain, that the word Saturnus should also have this very signification, if it be derived (as some think) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I deny not but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

Acts 17. 23. Esay 45. 15.

Reyneccius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Son of Javan, were the men who gave the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Trojans in their war. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crown of Troy. Hereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territory, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Æolians held in Asia, called Elæa, or Elaia, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidæmis, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neer sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greek Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing onely in the strength or weakness of utterance, which is found between many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans, being descended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the Son of Javan, who was Progenitor of the Greeks, might very well take a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Eleites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Ætolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountain Elæus, the Haven Elæus, the people Elaitæ, the City Elæus, Elaia, and Elateia; of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now vvhereas both the Cetæi and Arcadians, had their original from Cethim, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in language & similitude of names, they might nevertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that foun-founded the City Elateja) be named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius, purſuing this likelihood, thinks that when Euripylus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Son of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Auge, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia) was ſlain by Achilles in the Trojan War: then did Telephus, brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what evill might befall themſelves by the Greeks, if the affairs of Troy ſhould go ill) paſſed into that part of Italy, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Reyneccius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was firſt Elatinus, and then Latinus. That this name of Elatus may have bin taken or impoſed by the Arcadians, it is the more eaſie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Iphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sons of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gave name to the Countrey: and between theſe two families the ſucceſſion in that Kingdom did paſs, almoſt interchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Trojan war it fell into the hand of Hippotheus of the race of Elatus, in whoſe Poſterity it continued untill the laſt. Again, the name of Latinus, having a derivative ſound, agrees the better with the ſuppoſition of ſuch an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the leſs reproofe, conſidering that it is not eaſy to find either an apparent truth, or fair probability among theſe diſagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of Latium.

§. VI.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines untill Æneas his comming.

THe Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrival of Æneas, were Saturnus Picus, Faunus, & Latinus. Of Saturn there is nothing remembred, ſave what is mentioned already, and many Fables of the Greeks, which whether they be applyable to this man, it is for him to judge, who ſhall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturn of the Greeks called by them κρόνος, or ſome other, ſtiled Saturn by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have bin the ſame: but the names of Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the ſoil which they laid on their grounds had that appellation from him) do rather make him ſeem ſome other man.

Ezekiel often calls the Idols of the Heathen deos ſtercoreos: and hence it may be that in the Evangeliſt we read of Belzebub, Belzebul, which is interpreted Dominus ſtercoreus: and it may be that after that Saturn became the name of an Idol, it pleaſed God that in a like ſenſe this name Stercutius ſhould ſtick unto him. Æneid. 7.

Of Picus it is ſaid, that he was a good horſe-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Py, may well ſeem (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill which he had in ſooth-ſaying, or divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father: He gave to Evander the Arcadian (who having ſlain by miſchance his father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the waſt grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the ſiſter of Faunus, who was alſo his wife, as all Hiſtorians agree, ſhe was held a Propheteſs, and highly commended for her chaſtity, which praiſe in her muſt needs have bin much blemiſhed by her marriage, it ſelf being meerly inceſtuous.

It is uot mentioned that Faunus, had by his ſiſter any child, neither do we read of any other Wife which he had, ſave only that Virgil gives unto him Latinus as his Son, by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, ſave onely that her aboad was about the River Lyris near Minturnæ.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Ulyſſes by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice only of the ſecond, of whom he ſaith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cetii, were from his ſurname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference conſiſting almoſt in this only, that Suidas cals Telephus the ſon of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a ſon of the ſame name. This Latinus having obtained the ſucceſſion in that Kingdom after Faunus, did promiſe his only Daughter and Heir Lavinia, to Turnus the ſon of Venilia, who was ſiſter to Amata Latinus his Wife.

Suidas in the word Latini.

But when Æneas arrived in thoſe parts with fifteen ſhips, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked, according to the rate which Thucydides allows to the Veſſels then uſed, about one thouſand & two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would ſtand beſt with his aſſurance, to make alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great reputation of Æneas, which himſelf had heard of in the war of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus: who incenſed herewith, ſought to avenge himſelf by war: which was ſoon ended with his own death.

Of

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certain, that were she an Italian, she could not have born a Daughter marriageable at the arrival of Æneas; unless we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, who served in the last year of the Trojan War. But Reyneccius holds her an Asiatique, and thinks withall, that Lavinia was born before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassæus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seem by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Pallas. Amata, which signifieth beloved, or dear, was the name by which the High Priest called every Virgin whom he took to serve as a Nun of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoever Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Æneas, the Kingdom of Latium, or the greatest part of that Country, was established in that race: wherein it continued until it was overgrown by the might and greatness of the Romans.

§. IV.

Of Æneas, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba.

ÆNeas himself being of the Royal bloud of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his Wife Creusa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a son called Ascanius; whose surname was Julus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) been surnamed Ilus. But when Æneas was dead, his Wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was born after his fathers Funeral. This flight of Lavinia was so evil taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her return, entreated her honourably, and using her as a Queen, did foster her young son his half-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leaving to his mother in law the City Lavinium, which Æneas had built and called after his new Wives name, founded the City Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reign was, according to some, eight and twenty years: Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose contention between Sylvius, the son of Æneas, and Julus the son of Ascanius, about the Kingdom: but the people inclining to the son of Lavinia, Julus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdom to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

The reign of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans reign, I find thus set down:

1	Sylvius Posthumus.	29
2	Sylvius Æneas.	31
3	Sylvius Latinus.	50
4	Sylvius Alba.	39
5	Sylvius Atis.	26
6	Sylvius Capys.	28
7	Sylvius Capetus.	13
8	Sylvius Tiberinus.	8	years.
9	Sylvius Agrippa.	41
10	Sylvius Alladius.	19
11	Sylvius Aventinus.	37
12	Sylvius Procas.	23
13	Sylvius Amulius.	44
	Sylvius Numitor.

Ilia, called also Rhea and Sylvia.
Romulus. Remus.

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Towns in the borders of Latium: who standing much upon the honour of their original, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some think that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Æneas into Italy. The Mountain Aventinus had name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julius the brother of Aventinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Julius, and grandfather of Julius Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome: Numitor, the elder son of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdom by his brother Amulius; by whom also his son Ægesthus was slain, and Ilia his daughter made a Nun of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two sons, either by her Uncle Amulius, as some think; or by Mars, as the Poets feign; or perhaps by some man of war. Both the children, their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quick, according to the law; which so ſo ordained, when the Veſtal Virgins brake their chaſtity. Whether it was ſo, that the mother was pardoned at the entreaty of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, or puniſhed as the Law required (for Authors herein do vary) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preſerved, who afterward revenged the cruelty of their Uncle, with the ſlaughter of him and all his, and reſtored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdom: wherein how long he reigned, I find not, neither is it greatly material to know; for as much as the Eſtates of Alba and of Latinum were preſently eclipſed by the ſwift increaſe of Rome; upon which the computation of Time following (as far as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdom of Alba ceaſed; for Numitor left no male iſſue. Romulus choſe rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none elſe remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magiſtrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hoſtilius, King of the Romans, making War upon Rome, dyed in the Camp; and Metius Suffetius, the ſucceſſor of Cluilius, who ſurrendred the Eſtate of Alba unto the Romans, having committed the hazard of both Signories to the ſucceſs of three men of each ſide, who decided the quarrel by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romans, prevailed againſt the Curiatii, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hoſtilius with the Albane forces againſt the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battel, hoping thereby to leave the Romans to ſuch an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deal with; Tullus, who notwithſtanding this falſhood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruel death, cauſing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and ſo torn in pieces. Then was Alba deſtroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii: of whom C. Julius Cæſar being deſcended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royal, and forgotten pedigree, in full aſſembly of the Romans, then governed by a free Eſtate of the People: but by his rare induſtry, valour, and judgment, obtained the Soveraignty of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himſelf and his poſterity; whereby the name of Æneas, and honour of the Trojan and Alban Race, was ſo revived, that ſeldom, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdom, I may here beſt ſhew the beginnings, which (though ſomewhat uncertain) depend much upon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the laſt that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean, were broken in pieces by the iron teeth of this fourth Beaſt, it is not to be deſcribed in one place, having been the work of many Ages; whereof I now do handle onely the firſt, as incident unto the diſcourſe preceding. Fabius Pictor, Portius Cato, Calphurnius Piſo, Sempronius, and others, ſeek to derive the Romans from Janus: but Herodotus, Marſylus, and many others of equal credit, give the Græcians for their Anceſtors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Book, Cæcilius rerum Romanarum Scriptor, eo argumento colligit, Romam à Græcis eſſe conditam, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo inſtituto, Herculi rem ſacram faciunt: matrem quoque Evandri venerantur Romani; Cæcilius (ſaith he) a Roman Hiſtoriographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, becauſe the Romans, after Greekiſh faſhion, by ancient ordinance, do ſacrifice to Hercules: the Romans alſo worſhip the mother of Evander. Strab. 5. f. 159.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembreth many Founders of that City: as Romanus the ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe; Romus the ſon of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drave the Tuſcans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus beſtows the honour of building Rome upon Evander, ſaying, That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Græcians: others ſay, That it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witneſs S. Auguſtine in his third Book de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the work of Romulus, even from the foundation: of whom and his conſort, Juvenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their original, anſwered in theſe Verſes:

Attamen ut longè repetas longéque revolvas,
Majorum quiſquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut paſtor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so far;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepheard was, or else, that I'll forbear.
meaning, either a Shepheard or a Theif.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father; that he was nurst by a Wolf, found and taken away by Faustula a Shepheards wife. The same unnatural nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to me that he might have two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heir of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdom; the other, to satisfie his appetite, because she was fair and goodly. For she being made a Nun of the goddess Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to break her chastity. I also find in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Meroüee, King of the Francs, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Let them believe it that list; Il le croira qui voudra: Also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poetical inventions: But to answer these imaginations in general, It is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the mind, or as there were of vices and vertues, then did many women greatly born, cover such slips as they made, by protesting to be forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone confess to Paris, that she had been ravished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that he had known Venus. But Rhea was made with child by some man of War, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battel, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Meroüee might fancy a Sea Captain, to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Æneas was a bastard, and begotten upon some fair Harlot, called for her beauty Venus, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nurst by a Wolf, which was Lupa, or Lupina; for the Curtesans in those dayes were called Wolfs, Quæ nunc (saith Halicarnassæus) honestiori vocabulo amicæ appellantur; Which are now by an honester name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken up into heaven, or rather out of the world, by his father Mars, in a great storm of thunder and lightning: so was it said that Æneas vanished away by the River Numicus: but thereof Livie also speaketh modestly; for he rehearseth the other opinion that the storm was the fury of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree, that there was an unnatural darkness, both at his birth, and at his death; and that he might be slain by thunder or lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperor Anastasius was slain with lightning; so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slain with a thunder-bolt: so Carus the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilest he lodged with his Army upon the River Tygris, was there slain with lightning. But a Mars of the same Kind might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of War, and by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destiny followed most of the Roman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the seventh King after him: who when he had murthered his Father-in-law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (said he) Romulus himself died and was not buried. But let Halicarnassæus end this dispute; whose words are these: They (saith he) who drew neareſt to the truth, say that he was slain by his own Citizens; and that his cruelties in punishment of offenders, together with his arrogancy, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was ravished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sun was eclipsed, and all the earth covered with darkness like unto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Fauchet f. 114.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth contain (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles, which had soon been forgotten, if the Roman greatness built upon that foundation, had not given it memory in all ages following, even unto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of body, patient of travel, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the use of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect to revenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdom, that he himself might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned 37. years, first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till he was slain, as is already shewed: after which time, the Soveraignty fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him unknown, and more Priest-like than Kinglike;

like: wherein Rome it ſelf in her latter times hath ſomewhat reſembled this King. For having long bin ſole Governeſs, till Conſtantinople ſhared with her: afterwards, when as the Greek Emperour was cruſhed by forreign enemies, and the Latines diſpoyled of Imperial power, ſhe fell into the ſubjection of a Prelate, ſwelling by degrees from the Sheep-hook to the Sword, and therewith victorious to exceſſive magnificence, from whence by the ſame degrees it fell, being driven from luxury to defenſive arms, and therein having bin unfortunate, at length betakes her ſelf again to the Croſier ſtaff.

And thus much of Rome in this place, by occaſion of the ſtory of the times of King Ahaz, during whoſe reign in Jury, the foundations of this famous City were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Ezechia, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolemy, Nabonaſſar, Nabopolaſſar, and Mardocempadus, with the hiſtory of the Bible.

AS the firſt year of Ahaz his reign was confounded with the laſt of his father Jotham, ſo was the later end of his ſixteen years taken up in the three firſt of Ezechias his ſon. This appears by the Reign of Hoſea, over Iſrael, which began in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hoſea was the firſt of Ezechia; ſo it follows, that Ezechia began to reign in this Fathers fourteenth year. Like enough it is, that the third year of Hoſea, the ſame being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almoſt ſpent when Ezechia began, and ſo the fifteenth year of Ahaz may have been concurrent, for the moſt part, with the firſt of Ezechia.

By ſuppoſing that Hoſea began his Kingdom, when the twelfth year of Ahaz was almoſt compleat, ſome would find the means how to diſ-joyn the firſt of Hezechia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one year later, of which year, Ahaz may perhaps have lived not many days. But ſeeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth years of Ezechia may not be removed out of their places, it is vain labour to alter the firſt year.

2 Kin. 19. 35. In the fourteenth year of Ezechia, Senacherib, invaded Juda and the Countries adjoyning, loſt his Army by a miraculous ſtroak from Heaven, fled home, and was ſlain. The year following it was that God added ſixteen years to the life of Ezechia, when he had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty: and the ſame year was that miracle ſeen of the Suns going back; of which wonder (as I hear) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Aſtronomy, hath by calculation found the very day, which anſwered unto the twenty fift of April, in the Julian year, being then Thurſday. I have not ſeen any works of Scultet; but ſurely to find a motion ſo irregular and miraculous, it is neceſſary that he produce ſome record of obſervation made at ſuch a time. Howſoever it be, the fifteenth year of Ezechia agreed upon; and therefore we may not alter the firſt. As for that ſaying, which is uſual in like caſes, that Ahaz ſlept with his Fathers, & Ezechia his Son reigned in his ſtead, it doth no more prove that Ezechia reigned not with his Father, than the like ſaying doth inferr the like at the death of Jehoſaphat, and ſucceſſion of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Son to reign whileſt his Father lived, we have already ſaid enough. 2 Chro. 28. 27.

Of this godly King Ezechias, we find, that his very beginning teſtified his devotion and zeale. For whether it were ſo, that his unfortunate and ungracious father (who had out-worn his reputation) gave way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather think) the firſt year and firſt moneth of his reign, wherein Ezechias opened the doors of the Temple, were to be underſtood as the beginning of his ſole government; we plainly find it to have been his firſt work, that he opened the doors of the houſe of the Lord, which Achaz had ſhut up, cleanſed the City and Kingdom of the Idols, reſtored the Prieſts to their offices and eſtates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had bin for many years neglected, and brake down the braſen ſerpent of Moſes, becauſe the 2 Chro 29. v. 3. 2 Chro. 30.

people burnt incenſe before it, and he called it Nehuſhtan, which ſignifieth a lumpe of braſſe. He did alſo celebrate the paſſe-over with great magnificence, inviting thereunto the Iſraelites of the ten Tribes. Many there were, even out of thoſe Tribes, that came up to Jeruſalem, to this feaſt: But the generall multitude of Iſrael did laugh the Meſſengers of Ezechia to ſcorne.

It was not long ere they that ſcorned to ſolemnize the memoriall of their deliverance out of the Egyptian ſervitude, fell into a new ſervitude; out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechia his reign, Salmanaſſar the Son of Tiglath the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hoſea King of Iſrael had practiſed with So King of Egypt, againſt him, invaded Iſrael, beſieged Samaria, and in the third year (after the inhabitants had endured all ſorts of miſeries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Aſſyria and Media: among whom Tobias, and his Son of the ſame name, with Anna his Wife, were ſent to Nineve; in whoſe Seats and Places the Aſſyrians ſent ſtrangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Iſraelites, as thoſe of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, beſides Babylonians: whoſe Places and Nations I have formerly deſcribed in the Treatiſe of the Holy Land.

Theſe latter Aſſyrian Kings, and the Perſians, which followed them, are the firſt of whom we find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred books. Theſe therefore ſerve moſt aptly to joyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwiſe then fabulouſly) with the Ages following that were better known, and deſcribed in courſe of Hiſtory. True it is, that of Cyrus and ſome other Perſians, we find in the Bible the ſame names by vvhich other Authors have recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanaſſar, vvith other Aſſyrian, Chaldæan Kings, diverſity of name hath bred queſtion of the perſons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe ſpeak of Salmanaſſar, King of Aſſur, vvho reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezechia, Kings of Juda, and of Hoſea King of Iſrael, vvhom he carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolomy makes mention of Nabonaſſar, ſpeaking preciſely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to ſhew, that Salmanaſſar and Nabonaſſar were one and the ſame man. The like reaſon alſo requireth, that it be ſhewed of Nebuchadnezzer, that he was the ſame whom Ptolemy, calleth Nabopolaſſar.

Of both theſe points Bucholerus hath well collected ſufficient proofe from the exact calculations of ſundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appears, that between Nabonaſſar and the birth of Chriſt, there paſſed ſeven hundred forty and ſix years: at which diſtance of time the reign of Salmanaſſar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the ſame Bucholerus alledgeth out of Eraſmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolemy, ſpeaking of three Eclipſes of the Moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the ſame whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who ſent Embaſſadours to Hezekia King of Juda. So that if we reckon backward to the difference of time between Merodach and Salmanaſſar, we ſhall find it the ſame which is between Mardocempadus and Nabonaſſar. Likewiſe Functius doth ſhew, that whereas from the deſtruction of Samaria, to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzer, we collect out of the Scriptures, the diſtance of one hundred thirty and three years: the ſelf-ſame diſtance of time is found in Ptolemy, between Nabonaſſar and Nabopolaſſar. For whereas Ptolemy ſeems to ſuffer from this accompt, making Nabonaſſar more ancient by an hundred and forty years, than the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, wee are to underſtand that he took Samaria in the eighth year of his reign; ſo that the ſeven foregoing years added to theſe one hundred thirty and three, make the accompt of the Scriptures fall even with that of Ptolemy, Ptolemies computation is, that from the firſt of Nabonaſſar, to the fifth of Nabopolaſſar, there paſſed one hundred twenty and ſeven years. Now if wee add to theſe one hundred twenty ſeven, the thirteen enſuing of Nebuchadnezzers years, before the City and Temple were deſtroyed, wee have the ſum of one hundred and forty years. In ſo plain a caſe more proofes are needleſs, though many are brought, of which this may ſerve for all, that Ptolemy placeth the firſt of Nabopolaſſar, one hundred twenty and two years after the firſt of Nabonaſſar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To theſe notes are added the conſent of all Mathematicians: which in accompt of times I hold more ſure than the authority of any Hiſtory; aud therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Hiſtorians and Mathematical obſervations do ſo throughly concurr.

Yet foraſmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth reſt unanſwered, whereby he proved Baladan the Father of Merodach, to have been this Nabonaſſar, I will not ſpare to loſe a word or two in giving the Reader ſatisfaction herein. It is true, that the next obſervations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy recorded, after the time of Nabonaſſar, were in the reign of Mardocempadus; the ſecond year of whoſe reign, is, according to Ptolomy, concurrent in part with the twenty ſeven of Nabonaſſar. For the ſecond of three ancient Eclipſes which he calculates, being in the ſecond year of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonaſſar twenty ſeven years, ſeventeen dayes, and eleven hours: the accompt from Nabonaſſar, beginning at high-noon the firſt day of the Egyptian Moneth Thot, then anſwering to the twenty ſixt of February; and this Eclipſe being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the firſt day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; ſo that the difference of time between the two Kings Nabonaſſar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomy, according to the Egyptian years. But how doth this prove, that Mardocempadus or Meradach, was the Son of Nabonaſſar? yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next Succeſſour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to ſatisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himſelf did afterwards believe Mardocempadus to have been rather the Nephew than the Son of Baladan, or Nabonaſſar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Son; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But becauſe our Country-man Lidyat hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who follows Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calviſius, who hath drawn into form of Chronology, that learned work, De Emendatione Temporum, do hold up the ſame aſſertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonaſſar, I have taken the pains to ſearch, as far as my leiſure & diligence could reach, after any ſentence that might prove the Kindred or Succeſſion of theſe two: Yet cannot I find in the Almageſt (for the Scriptures are either ſilent in this point, or adverſe to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this buſineſs) any ſentence more nearly proving the ſucceſſion of Merodach to Nabonaſſar, than the place now laſt rehearſed: which makes no more, to ſhew that the one of theſe was father to the other, than (that I may uſe a like example) the as near ſucceſſion of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have been Son, or Grand-child to Edward the Confeſſor. This conſidered, we may ſafely go on with our account from Nabonaſſar, taking him for Salmanaſſar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our Book, when they find ſomething in it, agreeing with Annius, foraſmuch as theſe Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Aſſyria, in thoſe very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomy are aſſigned to Beloſus, Nabonaſſar, and Mardocempadus, and the reſt: no good Hiſtory naming any others that reigned there in thoſe ages; and all Aſtronomical obſervations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to theſe, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judæa from Senacherib.

WHen Salmanaſſar was dead, and his ſon Senacherib in poſſeſſion of the Empire, in the fourteenth year of Ezechias, he demanded of him ſuch Tribute as was agreed on, at ſuch time as Tiglath, the Grandfather of Senacherib, and Father of Salmanaſſar, invited by Ahaz, invaded Rezin King of Damaſcus, and delivered him from the dangerous War which Iſrael had undertaken againſt him. This Tribute and acknowledgment when Ezechias denied, Senacherib, having (as it ſeems) a purpoſe to invade Egypt, ſent one part of his Army to lye before Jeruſalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerful Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchaſed his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of ſilver, and thirty talents of gold, wherewith he preſented Senacherib, now ſet down before Lachis in Judæa; yet under the colour of better aſſurance, and to force the King of Judæa to deliver hoſtages, the Aſſyrian invironed Jeruſalem with a groſs Army, and having his ſword in his hand, thought it the fitteſt time to write his own conditions. 2 Kin. 18. 21.

Ezechias directed his three great Counſellers, to parly with Rabſaces over the Wall; and to receive his demands: who uſed three principal arguments to perſwade the people to yeild themſelves to his Maſter Senacherib. For though the Chancellour, Steward, and Secretary, ſent by Ezechias, deſired Rabſaces to ſpeak unto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Jewiſh, yet he with a louder voice directed his ſpeech to the multitude in their own language. And for the firſt, he made them know, That if they continued obſtinate, and adhered to their King, that they would in a ſhort time be inforced to eat their own dung, and drink their own urine: Secondly, he altogether diſabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Judæans hoped for ſuccour; and compared him to a broken ſtaffe, on which whoſoever leaneth, pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, that the gods who ſhould help them, Ezechias had formerly 2 Kin. 18. 21.

broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brasen Serpent, which had been preserved ever since Moses time: and withall he bade them remember the gods of other Nations, whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and thrown down; and for God himself, in whom they trusted, he perswaded them by no means to rely upon him, for he would deceive them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had understood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerful Army, he himself left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and sought Senacherib at Libna in Judæa, either to inform him of their resolution in Jerusalem, or to confer with him concerning the Army of Turhaca the Arabian. Soon upon this there came letters from Senacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly advised, and partly threatned to submit himself, using the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerful God, as before. But Ezechias sending those Counsellers to the Prophet Esay, which had lately been sent to Rabsaces, received from him comfort, and assurance, that this heathen Idolater should not prevail; against whom the King also besought aid from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Senacherib's letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true, That the King of Ashur had destroyed 2 Kin. 19. the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their gods, for they were no gods, but the works of mans hands, even wood and stone, &c.

The reason that moved Senacherib to desire to possess himself in haste of Jerusalem, was, that he might thereinto have retraited his Army, which was departed as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Egypt, for fear of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these Books of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speak but of the affairs of the Jews in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Josephus and Saint Hierom, together with Herod. l. 2. p. 69. Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Senacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might justly do, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead over Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petræa adjoyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Egypt, to be Vulcan's Priest; and reporteth that the reason of Senacherib's return from Pelusium in Egypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their Weapons in that kind, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarhaca, remembred by Josephus and Berosus, was the more urgent. Saint Hierome upon the seven and thirtieth of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Josephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words lye, reports Senacherib's retrait in these words: Pugnasse autem Senacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Ægyptios, & obsedisse Pelusium, jamque extructis aggeribus urbi capiendæ, venisse Taracham Regem Æthiopum in auxilium, & una nocte juxta Jerusalem, centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Assyrii pestilentia corruisse, narrat Herodotus: & plenissime Berosus Chaldaicæ scriptor Historiæ, quorum fides de propriis libris petenda est; That Senacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Ægyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for the taking of the City, Tarhacas King of the Æthiopians came to help them, and that in one night, near Jerusalem, one hundred eighty five thousand of the Assyrian Army perished by pestilence; of these things (saith Hierome) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of Chaldæan Story, whose credit is to be taken from their own Books. Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Army was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noise, a whirlewind, and a tempest, and a flame of devouring fire. But Josephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authority (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted; Senacherib autem ab Ægyptiaco bello revertens, offendit ibi exercitum quem sub Rabsacis imperio reliquerat peste divinitus immissâ deletum, primâ nocte post eaquam Urbem oppugnare cœperat, abjumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octoginta quinque millibus Militum; qua clade territus, & de reliquis copiis sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam quæ Ninus dicitur. Ubi paulo post per insidias Seniorum è filiis suis, Adramelechi, & Selennari, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur Arasci, quem præcipuo cultu dignabitur; quibus ob patricidium à popularibus pulsis, & in Armeniam fugientibus, Asaracoldas minor filius in Regnum successit; Senacherib (saith Josephus) returning from the Ægyptian War, found there his Army, which he had left under the command of Rabsaces, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begun to assault aſſault the Town: one hundred fourſcore and five thouſand of the Souldiers being conſumed with their Chieftains and Colonels. With which deſtruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the reſt of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where ſhortly after by the treaſon of two of the eldeſt of his Sons, Adramelch and Selenner or Sharezer, he loſt his life in the Temple dedicated to Araſces, or Neſroth; *Whom he eſpecially worſhiped. Aſaracoldas his younger Son ſucceeded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his reign ſent new troops out of Aſſyria to Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his Grand-father Salmanaſſar. What this Neſroth was, it is uncertain: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath ſomewhat of him, but nothing poſitively. It is certain, that Venus Urania was worſhiped by the Aſſyrians; and ſo was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Euſebius, and Cyrillus witneſſe. Many fancies there are, what cauſe his Sons had to murther him; but the moſt likely it is, that he had formerly diſ-inherited thoſe two, and conferred the Empire on Aſſarhaddon. Tobit tels us, that it was fiftie five dayes after Senacherib's returne, ere he was murthered by his Sons, during which time he ſlew great numbers of the Iſraelites in Nineve, till the moſt juſt God turned the ſword againſt his own breaſt. Lyr.

§. III.

Of Ezechias his ſickneſſe and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

AFter this marvellous deliverie, Ezechias ſickned, and was told by Iſaiah that he muſt dye: but after he had beſought God with tears for his delivery, Iſaiah, as he was going from him, returned again, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promiſe him recovery after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for fifteen years. But Ezechias ſomewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth for a ſign to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Iſaiah, the ſhadow of the Sunne caſt it ſelf the contrary way, and went back ten degrees, upon the Dyall of Achaz. The cauſe that moved Ezechias to lament (ſaith Saint Hierome) was, becauſe he had as yet no ſon, and then in deſpair that the Meſſias ſhould come out of the houſe of David, or at leaſt of his Seed. His diſeaſe ſeemeth to be the peſtilence, by the medicine given him by the Prophet, to wit, a maſſe of Figs, laid to the Botch or Sore. 2 Kin. 20.

This wonder when the Wiſe-men of Chaldæa had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the firſt of that houſe, he ſent to Ezechias, to be informed of the cauſe: at which time Ezechias ſhewed him all the Treaſure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Iſaiah, who told him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine houſe, and whatſoever thy Fathers have laid up in ſtore to this day, ſhall be carried into Babel; nothing ſhall be left, ſaith the Lord. It may ſeeme ſtrange, how Ezechia ſhould have got any treaſure worth the ſhewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the year before. But the ſpoyl of the ſame Senacherib his Camp repayed all with advantage, and made Ezekia richer upon the ſudden than ever he had been: which unexpected wealth was a ſtrong temptation to boaſting. After this time Ezekia had reſt, and ſpending without noiſe that addition which God had made unto his life, he dyed having reigned nine and twenty years. One only offenſive War he made, vvhich vvas againſt the Philiſtims, vvith good ſucceſs. Among his other acts (ſhortly remembred in Eccleſiaſticus) he deviſed to bring vvater to Jeruſalem. Eſay 39. Eccluſ. 28.

In two reſpects they ſay that he offended God: the one, that he rejoyced too much at the deſtruction and lamentable end of his enemy: the other, that he ſo much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to ſhew them to ſtrangers. But the reaſon vvhich moved Ezechias (ſpeaking humanely) to entertain the Embaſſadours of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, vvas becauſe he came to viſit him, and brought him a preſent, congratulating the recovery of his health; as alſo in that Merodach had weakned the houſe of Senacherib, his fearfull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant under Senacherib in Babylon, uſurped that State himſelf, in the laſt year of that King, and held it by ſtrong hand againſt his ſon Aſſarhaddon; who was not onely ſimple, but impaired in ſtrength, by the moleſtation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach eſpied, and remembring that their anceſtor Phul Belochus had ſet his own Maſter Sardanapalus beſides the cuſhion, thought it as lawfull for himſelf to take the opportunity which this Kings weakneſs did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make uſe of the others wickedneſs, and ſo, finding himſelf beloved of the Babylonians, and ſufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazzard, and prevailed, the aſſertion of this hiſtory is made by the ſame arguments ments that were in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearſe. So of this new race, which cut aſunder the Line of Ninus, there were onely five Kings.

Phul Belochus	reigned	48	years.
Tiglath Philaſſar		27
Salmanaſſar		10
Senacherib		7
Aſſarhaddon		10

But foraſmuch as the laſt year of Salmanaſſar was alſo the firſt of Senacherib his ſon, we reckon the time, wherein the houſe of Phul held the Aſſyrian Kingdom, to have been an hundred and one years, of which, the laſt five and twenty were ſpent with Ezechia, under Salmanaſſar, Senacherib, and Aſſarhaddon.

§. IV.

The Kings that were in Media during the reign of Ezechia: Of the difference found between ſundry Authors in rehearſing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Hezekia: Of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings deſcended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezekia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were ſo, that variety of names, by which theſe Kings were called in ſeveral Hiſtories, hath cauſed them to ſeem more than indeed they were; or whether the ſons reigning with the fathers, have cauſed not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion, or whether the Copies themſelves of Cteſias and Annius his Metaſthenes, have been faulty, as neither of theſe two Authors is over-highly commended of truſtineſs; ſo it is, that the names, number, and length of reign, are all very diverſly reported of theſe Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it need not ſeem ſtrange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezechia. For to reconcile ſo great a difference, as is found in thoſe writers that vary from Euſebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here ſet down the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as ſundry Authors have delivered it.

Annius his Metaſthenes orders them and their reigns thus:

Arbaces	reigned	28	years.
Mandanes		50
Soſarmon		30
Articarmin		50
Arbianes		22
Artæus		40
Artines		22
Aſtybarus, with his ſon Apanda		20
Apanda alone		30
Darius with Cyrus		36

Diodorus Siculus following Cteſias (as perhaps Annius made his Metaſthenes follow Diodore, with ſome little variation, that he might not ſeem a borrower) placeth them thus;

Arbaces	reigned	28	years.
Mandanes		50
Soſarmus		30
Articas		50
Arbianes		22
Arfæus		40
Artines		22
Artabanus		40

Aſtybara } the continuance of theſe two he Aſtyages } doth mention.

Mercator hath laboured, with much diligence, to reconcile theſe Catalogues, and to make them alſo agree with Euſebius. But foraſmuch as it ſeems to me an impoſſible matter, to attain unto the truth of his forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Cteſias and Metaſthenes, I will lay the burden upon Euſebius, who lived in an age better furniſhed than ours, with books of this argument. Let it therefore ſuffice, that theſe two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Euſebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not ſtay to ſearch. The Kings of Media, according to Euſebius, reigned in this order.

Arbaces	reigned	28	years.
Soſarmus		30
Medidus		40
Cardiceas		15
Deioces		54
Phraortes		24
Cyaxares		32
Aſtyages		38

Theſe names, and this courſe of ſucceſſion I retain; but adde unto theſe, Cyaxares, the ſon of Aſtyages, according to Xenophon; and ſometimes follow Herodotus, in ſetting down the length of a Kings reign, otherwiſe than Euſebius hath it: of which variations I will render my reaſons in due place.

The twenty nine years of Ezekia were concurrent, concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four firſt that were choſen Governours of Athens for ten years, that is, of Charops, Æſimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the firſt of theſe I hear nothing, ſave that Rome was built in his firſt year; of which perhaps himſelf did not hear. Of the ſecond and third I find only the names. The fourth made himſelf known by a ſtrange example of juſtice, or rather of cruelty, that he ſhewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that ſhe had offended in unchaſtity, cauſed her to be lockt up with an Horſe, giving to neither of them any food: ſo the Horſe, conſtrained by hunger devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the firſt King, and founder of that City Romulus, did reign both before, and ſomewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the laſt King ruled in the ſame age.

This Region was firſt called Mæonia. Lydus the ſon of Atys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe ſuch authority as we find. This Kingdom was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Alcæus the ſon of Hercules, by Jardana, a bond-woman. The race of theſe Heraclidæ continued reigning fifty five years (in which two and twenty Generations paſſed) the ſon continually ſucceeding the father. Candaules the ſon of Myrſus was the laſt of his race, who doated ſo much upon the beauty of his own wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges the ſon of Daſcylus to behold her naked body, and placed the unwilling man ſecretly in her chamber, where he might ſee her preparing to bedward. This was not ſo cloſely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and underſtanding the matter, took it in ſuch high diſdain, that ſhe forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treaſon. So Gyges being brought again into the ſame chamber by the Queen, ſlew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight years, beginning in the laſt of Ezekia one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his ſon Ardys reigned nine and forty years; then Sadyattes twelve; Halyattes, fifty ſeven, and finally Cræſus the ſon of Halyattes, fourteen years: who loſt the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Perſia.

And here by the way we may note that as the Lydian Kings whom Cræſus his Progenitor diſpoſſeſt, are deduced from Hercules, ſo of the ſame Hercules there ſprang many other Kings, which governed ſeveral Countreys very long; as in Aſia, the Myſians, in Greece, the Lacædemonians, Meſſenians, Rhodians, Corinthians and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians, as likewiſe from the Corinthians, the Syracuſans: beſides many great and famous, though private families.

But of the Heraclidæ that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my ſelf to take notice of the time of their ſeveral reigns: for little is found of them beſide the bare names, and the folly of this laſt King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, between the deliverance of Iſrael from thence, and the reign of Ezekiah in Juda when Egypt and Juda made a league againſt the Aſſyrians.

§. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Hiſtory, are like to have belonged only to Viceroys. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his Hiſtory of the Holy War.

THE emulation and quarrels ariſing in theſe times, between, the mighty Kingdoms of Egypt and Aſſyrians, do require our pains, in collecting the moſt memorable things in Egypt, and ſetting down briefly the ſtate of that Countrey, which had continued long a flouriſhing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Aſſyria for the maſtery. Of Cham the ſon of Noah, who firſt planted that Country, and of Oſiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings that reigned there, untill the Iſraelites were thence delivered, more hath been ſaid already than I can ſtand to; though I hold it no ſhame to fail in ſuch conjectures. That which I have delivered, in ſpeaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynaſties, muſt here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are ſaid to have reigned reigned in Egypt, vvere none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, ſuch as Joſeph vvas, and ſuch as vvere the Soldans in latter ages. Therefore I will not onely forbear to ſeek after thoſe, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian Prieſts, delivering them by number, without rehearſing their names; but will ſave the labour of marſhalling them in order, whoſe names onely are found; the years of their reigns, and other circumſtances proving them to have been Kings indeed, being not recorded.

But that I may not ſeem before hand to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I liſt; it were not amiſſe, to give unto the Reader ſuch ſatisfaction in this point, as apparent reaſon, and truth of Hiſtorie doth afford, Firſt therefore, we ought not to believe thoſe numbers of Generations, which the lying Preiſts have reckoned up, to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham our Saviour Chriſt was removed onely forty two deſcents; which makes it evident, that in farre ſhorter time, namely before the Perſian Empire, there could not have paſſed away twice as many ſucceſſions in Egypt: eſpecially conſidering, that many of theſe, whoſe continuance is expreſſed, having reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we ſhould ſquare the number of the Egyptian Kings in ſome even proportion, to thoſe which did bear rule in other Countries. As for the reſt whoſe names we find ſcattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to read the nineteenth book of the Holy Warr, written by William Archbiſhop of Tyre, may eaſily perſwade himſelf, that it is not hard to find names enow, of ſuch as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here inſert as breifly as I can, ſome things making to that purpoſe, for the pleaſure and information of ſuch as will not trouble themſelves with turning over many Authors.

When Elahdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a ſubtile man, made himſelf Soldan, by force and cunning, chaſing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan miniſtred matter of quarrel to Amalrick King of Jeruſalem; and ſuſtained, with little loſſe, an invaſion, which Amalrick made upon Egypt. hereupon he grew ſo inſolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good againſt him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Sanar ſueth to Noradine, King of Damaſco, for ayde, who ſends an Armie of his Turks, under the command of Syracon, againſt the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The victorie was Dargans; but he enjoyed it not: For in few dayes after, he was ſlain by treaſon, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignitie: which to eſtabliſh, he ſlew all the kindred and freinds of Dargan, that he could find in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all theſe doings, the Caliph Elhadech gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the adminiſtration of the kingdome, whileſt he might have the profit of it, and his pleaſure. But new troubles preſently ariſe, which (one would think) do neerly touch the Caliph himſelfe. Syracon with his Turks, whom Sanar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They ſeize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrivall of more companie from Damaſco, for the conqueſt of all Egypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and finds himſelf not ſtrong enough to expell them, much leſſe to expell the Turkiſh Armie that was likely to ſecond them: He therefore ſends Meſſengers to King Almarick of Jeruſalem, whom with large promiſes he gets to bring him ayde, and ſo drives out the Turks: Of all this trouble the great Caliph hears nothing, or not ſo much as ſhould make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater miſchief ariſeth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly in his own Title. Syracon, Captain of the Turks that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was oppoſite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heir to Mahomet that falſe Prophet, the Soveraigntie over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tels him the weakneſs of the Egyptian, with his own abilitie of doing ſervice in thoſe parts; offering his beſt means for the extirpation of the Schiſmaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Weſtern parts, under the ſubjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eaſtern Provinces are up in Arms, and Syracon, with a mighty power, deſcendeth into Egypt. The noyſe of this great expedition ſo affrighteth King Almarick, that with all his forces he haſteth into Egypt, well knowing how neerly it concerned him and his kingdome of Jeruſalem, to keep the Saracens from joyning all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithfull care of the Chriſtians his friends, welcomes them, and beſtirs himſelfe in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him:

him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drave the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victory was not ſo ſoon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which moſt concerns our preſent purpoſe) that of ſo deſperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, ſeems to know nothing. May we not think him to have been King in title onely, who meddled ſo little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Chriſtians (without whoſe help all was loſt) could not well ſtay ſo long as his neceſſities required, makes large offers to King Almarick, upon condition that he ſhould abide by it. He promiſeth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Sarazens, perhaps, called it a Penſion) which the Kings of Jeruſalem ſhould receive out of Egypt, for this behoveful aſſiſtance. But the Chriſtians underſtanding that the Soldan (how much ſoever he took upon him) was ſubject to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of ſuch importance with any other than the Caliph himſelf. Hereupon Hugh Earl of Cæſarea, and a Knight of the Templers, are ſent unto Elhadech to ratifie the covenants. Now ſhall we ſee the greatneſs of the Caliph and his eſtate.

Theſe Embaſſadours were conveighed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great Troops of Souldiers. The firſt entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopians, which with all diligence did reverence to the Soldan as he paſſed along. Through theſe ſtreights the Warders lead them into goodly open Courts, of ſuch beauty and riches, that they could not retain the gravity of Embaſſadours, but were inforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they ſaw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beams, all wrought over with embоſſed Works, curious Pavements, Fiſhponds of Marble with clear Waters, and many ſorts of ſtrange Birds, unknown in thoſe parts of the World, as comming perhaps from the Eaſt Indies, which then was undiſcovered. The further they went, the greater was their magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conveyed them into other Courts within theſe, as far excelling the former, as the former did ſurpaſs ordinary houſes. It were tedious perhaps to rehearſe how the further they entred, the more high ſtate they found, and cauſe of marvaile; ſuffice it, that the good Archbiſhop, who wrote theſe things, was never held a vain Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliph's own lodgings, which were yet more ſtately and better guarded; where entring the Preſence, the Soldan having twice proſtrated himſelf, did the third time caſt off his Sword that he wore about his neck, and throw himſelf on the ground before the Curtain, behind which the Caliph ſate. Preſently the traverſe wrought with Gold and Pearls was opened, and the Caliph himſelf diſcovered, ſitting with great Majeſty on a Throne of Gold, having few of his moſt inward ſervants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kiſſed his Maſters feet, he briefly told the cauſe of his comming, the danger wherein the Land ſtood, and the offers that he made unto King Almerick, deſiring the Caliph himſelf to ratifie them in preſence of the Embaſſadors. The Caliph anſwered, That he would throughly perform all which was promiſed. But this contented not the Embaſſadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptians that ſtood by thought an impudent requeſt. Yet his greatneſs condeſcenced at length, after much deliberation, at the earneſt requeſt of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earl of Cæſaria ſaw that the Caliph gave his hand neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth ſeeks no holes to hide it ſelf; Princes that will hold Covenant, muſt deal openly, nakedly, and ſincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we ſhall truſt you, for we will make no bargain with your Glove. Much adoe there was about this: for it ſeemed againſt the Majeſty of ſuch a Prince to yield ſo far. But when it would none otherwiſe be, with a ſmiling chear (though to the great grief of his Servants) he vouchſafed to let the Earl take him by the bare hand; and ſo rehearſing the covenants word by word, as the Earl ſpake them, he ratified all; diſmiſſing finally the Embaſſadors with ſuch rewards as teſtified his greatneſs.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may diſcern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we ſee a Prince of great eſtate, ſitting in his Palace, and not vexing himſelf with the great preparations made againſt him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we ſee his Viceroy, in the mean ſeaſon, uſing all Royal power; making War and Peace; entertaining and repelling Armies of ſtrangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary to a forrain Prince. What greater authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh said unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings throne will I be above thee. Behold I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt?

I do not commend this form of Government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine Author, where he thinks, that the Egyptians, ever since Joseph's time, have felt the burden of that servitude which he brought upon them, when he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I find his judgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customs practised by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolemies (excepting Ptolomæus Lagi, and his son Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were given, all of them wholly, to please their own appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdom to Women, Eunuches, and other Ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous life, and the awful regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gave them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroys governing Egypt, is set down by Moses, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre, who lived in the same age, was in few years after Chancellor of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and had full discourse with Hugh Earl of Cæsaria touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Countrey; after whom it follows that we should make inquiry.

§. II.

Of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. Of Osymandyas and his Tomb.

IN this businesse I hold it vain to be too curious. For who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius from both of them; and late Writers that have sought to gather the truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annius would doe good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him when others do either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore hold my self contented with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities removed so far out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius have not been silent, and that Reyneccius hath taken pains to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, unto the reign of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of reign.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded unto Chencres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reyneccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King named Osymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reineccius conjectures was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the distance between them was more than eight generations. Mercator judgeth Osymandyas to have been the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Josephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wives into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wives right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging alſo to Vchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the reſt had. I will not vexe my braines in the unprofitable uſe of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Oſymandyas, was wrought upon his monument; the moſt thereof in figures, which I thinke the Egyptians did fabulouſly expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army, with the ſeige of a Town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this the Egyptians ſaid to denote the conqueſt of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly peice of work, which Diodore ſo particularly deſcribes, to have been erected for a common place of buriall to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilſt yet they were not ſo ambitious, as every one to have his own particular monument, ſtriving therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many ſtatues therein placed, by the Wars, the judgement ſeate, the receiving of Tribute, the offering ſacrifice to God, the account of revenues, and plenty of all cattell and food: all which were there curiouſly wrought, ſhewing the ſeverall Offices of a Governour. On the Tomb of Oſymandy as was this inſcription. I am Oſymandyas King of Kings; if any deſire to know what I am, or where I lye, let him exceed ſome of my works. Let them that hope to exceed his works, labour to know what he was. But ſince by thoſe words, Or where I lye, it ſhould ſeem that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully ſuſpect that it was Joſeph, whoſe body was preſerved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty monument might King Orus, who out lived him, erect in honour of his high deſerts, among the royall ſepulchres. To which purpoſe the plenty of Cattel and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name of Oſymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; ſeeing Joſeph had one new name given him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, upon further occaſions, have another to his increaſe of honour. As for that ſtile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerberg, as the Turkiſh Baſſaes are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now although it be ſo, that the reckoning fals out right, between the times of Joſeph & Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whoſe Viceroy Joſeph was) yet will I hereby ſeek, neither to fortifie mine own conjecture, as touching Joſeph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Vchoreus. For it might well be that Memphis was built by ſome ſuch King as was Gehoar, Lieutenant unto the Caliph Elcaim; who having to his Maſters uſe conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly ſo pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Miſtreſſe, though he himſelf were a Dalmatian ſlave. John Leo. Hiſt. Africa. l. 1. & l. 8.

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameſſes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that bears his name.

WHen Archerres had reigned eight years, Cherres ſucceeded and held the kingdome fifteen years: then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Rameſſes threeſcore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameſſes is that Hiſtorie underſtood by Euſebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the names of Danaus and Egyptus. For it is ſaid that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom upon ſeeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brothers fiftie ſons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the firſt night; that onely Hipermneſtra, one of his Daughters, did ſave her husband Linceus, and ſuffered him to eſcape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudy ſiſters, when they dyed, were enjoyned this fooliſh puniſhment in Hell, to fill a leaking veſſel with water.

The reign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus was Danaus, and Rameſſes, Ægyptus, is more than Reineccius believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Meris, who cauſed the great lake to be made which bears his name. For my own part, as I can eaſily beleive, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of ſuch qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we ſpake before; ſo do I not find how in ſo ſhort a reign, as five years, a work of that labour could be finiſhed, which was required unto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his own Sepulchre and his wives being ſome part, it is manifeſt that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whoſe age is uncertain, and of whoſe reigns we have no aſſurance, I may truly ſay, that their great vvorks are not enough to prove were those of Joseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for bread; of Gehoar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Country Tributary; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set down the length of their reigns whom we find to have followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compass, and fifty fadoms deep. It served to receive the waters of Nilus, when the overflow, being too great, was harmful to the Country: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the river did not rise high enough. In opening the sluces of this lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fifty talents; but the lake it self defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed upon fish taken therein was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy sweet Ointments and other Ornaments for her body. In the middest of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fifty paces high; having on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I find not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet it is very great. The years of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inserting one Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should have reigned one year and odd moneths of the time: but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Rameses, his son Amenophis held the Kingdom forty years. Some give him only nineteen years; and Mercator thinks him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have already spoken in the first Book.

§. IV.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynasty of the Larthes.

Sethosis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fifty five years. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that antient Sesostris. But the state of the World was not such at these times, that so great an expedition as the old Sesostris made, could have been either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now been performed; as any man will perceive, if he look upon my Chronological Table, and consider who lived with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynasty of the Larthes; which Reineccius conjectures to have had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being issued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have signified as much as Imperator, or General. The Wars in which these Kings were Generals, I take to have been against the Æthiopians: for sure I am, that they troubled not the Country of Palæstina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the desart sands, on the other hand, to seek matter of conquest, in the poor Countries of Africa. But these Generals (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five only had that title; and the last of these took it, perhaps, as hereditary from the first; in such sort as the Roman Emperours were proud, for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most unsuitable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his successors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appears by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings also did administer the government themselves, and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much unto the Viceroys. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends only upon conjecture, and that the authority of the Regents, or Viceroys, might be great enough, though some few Kings took the conduct of Armies into their own hands. For so we find in John Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after such time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soveraignty to himself) had under him a Viceroy, stiled Eddaguadare, who had authority to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Family was almost as great as the Soldans own. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord General of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might, as he thought good, spend of the Soldans treasure. So might the office of the Viceroys continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generals upon them, did somewhat abridge the greatness of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawn; whether from their Country, as those of the Thebans and Diapolitans; or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seventeenth John Leo 8.

Dynasty

Dynasty was called of the Shepheards, because Joseph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sesac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the business which we left.

Rameses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threescore and six years. He is mistaken for that second Sesostris, of whom I have spoken in the first book. I find nothing worth rehearsal of this Rameses, or of Amenophis and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned forty, the latter six and twenty years. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditary.

Thuoris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven years; yet is he thought to have been that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thuoris his reign lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others mentioned by Greek Writers in this business, or in other such matters, may seem to be under-Officers: for such only are like to have had their residence about Pharos, and the sea-coast where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said that he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himself into all shapes: whereby is signified his crafty head, for which he is grown into a Proverb. The Poets feigned him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptune's Seal-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admiral, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes the son of Proteus is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long tale fit to please children of his covetousness, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning thief, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may believe what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor think that either he or his father did reign at all.

§. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings, whose names are found scattering in sundry Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Sesac.

MAny other names of Egyptian Kings are found scattered here and there; as Tonepherfobis, of whom Suidas delivers only the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Enenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as, that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Devil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had been, or after him should be so mighty as himself. The answer or confession of the Devil was remarkable; which I find Englished in the translation of Plessis his work Of the trueness of Christian Religion. The Greek Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then
The Spirit,
Which Three be One, and joyn in One all Three:
Whose force is endless. Get thee hence frail
Wight,
The man of Life unknown excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the form of invocation which Thulis used, and that clause of his giving name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giving to this King such profound antiquity of reign. Indeed the very name of that book, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspicion of some imposture: but the Frierly stuffe that he alledgeth out of it, is such as would serve to discredit himself, were it not otherwise apparent that he was a man both devout, and of good judgment in matters that fell within his compass. I will here set down the list of old old Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets down, is Mizraim the son of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedegree thus: Nimrod the son of Chus was also called Orion, and further took upon him the name of the Planet Saturn, had to Wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, and by her three sons; Picus, surnamed Jupiter, Belus, and Ninus. Picus chasing his Father out of Assyria into Italy, reigned in his stead thirty years, and then gave up that Kingdom to Juno his sister and wife, and to Belus his son: after which Belus, who reigned only two years, Ninus had the Kingdom, and married his own Mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italy to visit his old Father Saturn; Saturn forthwith resigned the Kingdom unto him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italy threescore and two years, had threescore and ten Wives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally dyed, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete. The Principal of Jupiter's sons were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercury: he reigned in Italy, after his Father, five and thirty years, and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure, where, after the death of Misraim, he got the Kingdom, and held it nine and thirty years. After Mercury, Vulcan reigned in Egypt, four years and a half. Then Sol, the son of Vulcan, reigned twenty years and a half. There followed in order Sosis, Osiris, Orus and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their several reigns is not set down. After Thules, was the great Sesostris King twenty years. His successor was Pharaoh, called Narecho, that held the Crown fifty years, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharaoh, to a very long posterity.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set down as I find them: let their credit rest upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certain note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vain curiosity, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have been added.

Clem. Strom. l. 1. Euseb. de Præp. Evang. l. 9. c 4. 1 Kings 9 16 & 11. v. 18. 19, &c.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sesac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, lead us again into fair way, but not far. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These give us not the length of his reign; but we know that he lived in the times of David and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Army, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daughter, Salomon's wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his son did favour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wives and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princess. In the life of Rehoboam all hath been written that I find of Sesac, excepting the length of his reign, which must have been six and twenty years, if he were that Smendis with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynasty.

Now forasmuch as it would serve to no great purpose, that we knew the length of Sesac his reign, and of theirs that followed him, unless therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, upon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth year of Jehojakim King of Juda, in which Pharao Neco was slain, I reckon upwards the years of the same Neco, and of his Predecessors, unto the beginning of Sesac: by which accompt, the first year of Sesac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Salomon's reign, and the twenty sixt of Sesac with the fifth of Rehoboam, wherein Sesac spoiled the Temple, and dyed, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer than Joas the Israelite, and Crassus the Roman did; who after him spoiled the Temple of Jerusalem.

To fill up the time between Sesac and Neco, I have rather taken those Kings that I find in the Greek Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of those that are delivered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save only of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King. Hereunto I may add, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Æthiopians, which got the Kingdom often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Esay, that the Counsellors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, insomuch that they said of Pharaoh, I am the son of the wise, I am the son of the ancient King. But that which overthrows the reckoning of Eusebius, is the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the reigns of Josias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed mars all, the reign of Josias being misplaced. This errour grows from his omitting to compare the reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion Joram King of Israel is made to reign three years after Ahazia of Juda; Samaria is taken by Salmanassar before Hezechia was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings have their beginnings placed in some other year of their collaterals than the Scriptures have determined.

§. VI.

Of Chemnis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezechia.

FOllowing therefore the Greek Historians, I place Chemnis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the rank of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fifty years, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this Worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottom upwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemnis being four-square, had a Base of seven acres every way, and was about six acres high. It was of a very hard and durable stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand years, without complaining of any injury that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reign of Chemmis, unto the age of Augustus Cæsar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thousand years; which doth give the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemnis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers do testifie, that they have seen them yet standing.

Diodor. l. 1. After Chemnis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his Brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his son Chabreus Herod. l. 2. succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreas) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have been brethren; but the length of their reigns may argue the latter to have been son to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty years; Cephrenes fifty six. These were, as Chemmis had been, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had overlaboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombs for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to have cast out their bodies, and to have called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entituling a poor fellow to their works, was held to be the casting out of their bodies; otherwise it is hard to conceive how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoid the like slavery laid upon them by the younger brother or son, should have power or leisure to take such revenge upon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale devised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father wanting money, did prostitute her, and that she getting of every man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike she was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery for her sake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument with the superfluity of her Fathers provisions.

Mycerinas the son of Cephrenes reigned after his Father six years. He would have built as his fore-goers did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of six years only, because of this his devotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should have been afflicted an hundred and fifty years, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou live but six years. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his piety; or that they should decree to make a Country impious, when the people were desirous to serve them; or that they having so decreed, it should lye in the power of a King to alter destiny, and make the ordinance of the gods to fail in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true god was doubtless more offended with the institution of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knows whether Chemnis did not learn somewhat at Jerusalem in the last year of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is, that his reign, and the reigns of Cheops and Cephrenes were more long and more happy than that of Mycerinas, who, to delude the Oracle, revelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Devil, than the restitution of Idolatry durst then seem, when it could speed no better. I find in Reineccius fifty years assigned to this King; which I verily believe to have been some errour of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such oversights: For I know no Author that that gives him so many years, and Reineccius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by divers Authors, as one that loved justice; and may be taken for that Banchyris whom Suidas commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons 44. years of his reign.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Æthiopian follows in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certain ages after him. Herodotus quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Asychis; who made a sharp law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Asychis made a Pyramis of brick, more costly and fair, in his own judgment, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Asyckis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blind man, before the Æthiopian. The reigns of these two are perhaps those many ages which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted between Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but six years; and so long doth Functius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings between them both did govern. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it unprobable that the reigns of two Kings should have been so soon spent; he may do it by taking some years from Sethon or Psammiticus, and adding them to either of these. To add unto these without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reign, must have been in the fifth of Rehoboam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Jehojakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine own part, I like it better to allow six years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Sennacherib's War, at which time Sethon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore add years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto these men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great envy to leave both Asychis and Anysis out of the roll, which were easily done by placing Sesac lower,, and extending his life yet six years further, or more (if the like abridgment shall be required of Psammiticus his reign) into the years of Rehoboam.

1 King. 14. 25. 2 Chron. 12. v. 2.

Of Sabacus the Æthiopian, who took the Kingdom from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fifty years. He was a merciful Prince, not punishing all capital offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whose toil he both got much wealth into his own hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works of more use than pomp, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonoras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelite from destruction.

It seems, that the encroaching power of the Assyrian grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar and Salmanassar having eaten so far into Syria, in the reign of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his dayes (for his reign began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himself did make the first entrance into Palæstina. This caused So to animate the half-subdued people against their Conquerors; but the help which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Sennacherib's Embassador compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reed. Such indeed had Hosea found it, and such Ezechia might have found it, had he not been supported by the strong staffe of him that ruleth all Nations with a rod of iron. It appeareth by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, for Chariots and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needful, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it self, which So left unto Sethon his Successor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his reign. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Country, and willingly retired into Æthiopia, because it was often signified unto him in his dreams, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reign should be neither long nor prosperous, unless he slew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdom. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their servants, and invited Kings to do them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chief gods had the property of Dogs, vvhich love their Maſters the better for beating them. Yet to vvhat end the Prieſts ſhould have feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be ſome device of the fearful old man, vvho ſeeing his Realm in danger of an invaſion, ſought an honeſt excuſe for his departure out of it, and vvithdrawing himſelf into Æthiopia, vvhere he had been bred in his youth. What if I ſhould ſay, that the Æthiopia into vvhich he vvent, vvas none other than Arabia, vvhereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the inſtigation of this man) raiſed an Army againſt Sennacherib, vvhen he meant to invade Egypt vvithin two or three years after? but I vvill not trouble my ſelf vvith much enquiry. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus vvas not indeed an Æthiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Eſay, who mentioneth the antiquity of Pharaohs houſe) but only ſo ſurnamed for his education, and becauſe iſſuing from thence, he got the Kingdom from Anyſis, who was his oppoſite. The quiet and mild form of his government, his holding the Kingdom ſo long without an Army, and many other circumſtances argue no leſs. But whether finally he betook a private life, or whether he fore-went his life and Kingdom at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and ſpeak of Sethon his next Succeſſor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a ſure token of his having been King.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezechia, and ſided with him againſt Sennacherib.

THE firſt year of Sethon's reign falls into the twelfth of Ezechia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troubleſome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdoms of Aſſyria and Egypt, being then ingaged in a War, the iſſue whereof was to determine whether of them ſhould rule or ſerve. The Aſſyrian had the better men of War; the Egyptian better proviſion of neceſſaries: the Aſſyrian more Subjects; the Egyptian more Friends: and among the new conquered half Subjects of Aſſur, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Aſſyrian in outward ſhew.

Of this laſt ſort were Ezechia and his people; who knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them againſt his own great Enemy, preferred the friendſhip of ſo near and mighty a Neighbour, before the ſervice of a terrible, yet far removed King. But herein was great difference between Ezechia and his Subjects: For the good King fixing his eſpecial confidence in God, held that courſe of policy, which he thought moſt likely to turn to the benefit of his Country; the multitude of Judæa looking into the fair hopes which this Egyptian league promiſed, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was ſafe, and that now they ſhould not need to fear any more of thoſe injuries which they had ſuffered by the Aſſyrians; and ſo became forgetful of God, taking counſel, but not of him. The Prophet Eſay complained much of this preſumption; giving the people of Juda to underſtand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Horſes fleſh, and not ſpirit; that God himſelf ſhould defend Iſrael upon repentance, and that Aſſur ſhould fall by the ſword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (ſaid the Prophet) they are vanity, and they ſhall help in vain: their ſtrength is to ſit ſtill.

Eſay 31. vl. 3. and 8.

Eſay 30. 7.

Eſay 3. 4.

According to the Prophets words it came to paſs. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and aſſurance was given to the Jews by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with ſuch reports, of Horſes and Chariots, that they did not look (as Eſay ſaith) unto the holy One of Iſrael, nor ſeek unto the Lord. But he yet is wiſeſt.

Eſay 31. 1, 3

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, and wakened them out of theſe dreams; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as near as he was, did ſeem far off, being unready, when his help was moſt needful. It may ſeem that he purpoſed rather to make Palæſtina, than Egypt, the ſtage whereon this great War ſhould be acted, and was not without hope, that the Aſſyrians and Jews, weakning one another, ſhould yeild unto him a fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with mony; for he ſent Horſes and Camels laden with treaſure, to hire the Arabians, whom Eſay calleth a people that cannot profit. Theſe Arabians did not profit indeed; for (beſides that it ſeems by the ſame place of Eſay, that the rich treaſures miſcarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any help appeared from Tirhaca) all the ſtrong Cities of Juda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Jeruſalem it ſelf, which were in ſore diſtreſs, till the ſword of God and not of Man, defeated the Aſſyrian, who did go, for fear, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Nineve, where he was ſlain.

Eſay 30. 6.

Eſay 31. 9.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purpoſed againſt Egypt, where the men of War, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, re-fuſed to bear arms in defence of him and their Country; that Sethon being Vulcan's Prieſt bemoaned himſelf to his god, who by dream promiſed to ſend him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with ſuch as would follow him, (which were craftſ-men, ſhop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Peluſium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Camp of Senacherib by night, did ſo gnaw the bows, quivers, and ſtraps of his mens armour, that they were fain the next day to fly away in all haſte, finding themſelves diſarmed. In memory hereof (ſaith Herodotus) the ſtatue of this King is ſet up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouſe in his hand, with this inſcription, Let him that holds me ſerve God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Prieſts, wherein how far they ſwarved from the truth, being deſirous to magnifie their own King, it may eaſily be perceived. It ſeems that this Image of Sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or elſe perhaps, the Prieſts did forbear to tell it him (which cauſed him to omit it) for that the nation of the Jews was then well known to the world, whereof every child could have told how much falſhood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this hiſtory agreeable to the Scriptures, thus far forth; That Senacherib King of the Aſſyrians and Arabians, (ſo Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure ſome borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made War upon Egypt, and was miraculouſly driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleaſure that Vulcan did unto his Prieſt, happy it was (if Sethon were a Prieſt) that he took his god now in ſo good a mood: For within three or four years before this, all the Prieſts in Egypt ſhould have been ſlain, if the merciful King had not ſpared their lives, as it were half againſt the gods will. Therefore this laſt good turn was not enough to ſerve as an example, that might ſtir up the Egyptians to piety, ſeeing that their devotion, which had laſted ſo long before, did bring all the Prieſts into danger of ſuch a bad reward. Rather I think, that this Image did repreſent Senacherib himſelf, and that the Mouſe in his hand, ſignified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expreſſing things) the ſhameful iſſue of his terrible expedition, or the deſtruction of his Army, by means which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, ſhewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to piety. But the Emblem, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chief Temple in that Town vvhere this Image was erected) might give occaſion to ſuch a fable; the Divel helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that vve may not belie the Devil, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himſelf in danger, did call upon his gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had moſt devotion. But ſo had other of his predeceſſors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained ſuccour by the like miracle? Surely the Jews (even ſuch of them as were moſt given to Idolatry) would have been aſhamed of the confidence which they repoſed in the Chariots of Egypt, becauſe they were many, and in the Horſemen, becauſe they were very ſtrong; had it been told them, that Sethon, inſtead of ſending thoſe Horſ-men and Chariots, was beſeeching Vulcan to ſend him and them good luck; or elſe (for theſe alſo were Egyptian gods) addreſſing their prayers to ſome Onyon or Cat. Howſoever it was, doubtleſs the Prophecy of Eſay took effect, which ſaid, They ſhall be all aſhamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good, but ſhall be a ſhame & alſo a reproach. Such is commonly the iſſue of humane vviſdom, when reſting ſecure upon proviſion that it ſelf hath made, it vvill no longer ſeem to ſtand in need of God. Eſay 31. 1.

Some there are who take Sethon to have been ſet down by Euſebius under the name of Tarachus the Æthiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reign of Sethon. Theſe have well obſerved that Tarachus the Æthiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Country, or at leaſt an enemy to Sennacherib, in the war laſt ſpoken of; the Æthiopians (as they are engliſhed) over which he reigned, being indeed Chuſhites or Arabians. Hereupon they ſuppoſe aright, that Euſebius hath miſtaken one King for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirhaka is placed in the room of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Æthiopian (as he is called) began his reign over Egypt, by Euſebius his accompt, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezechia, in the firſt year of Manaſſes King of Juda. Therefore he or his years have no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Funccius peremptorily citing no Author, nor alledging reaſon for it, ſets him down thirty three years; many omit him quite; and they that name him are not careful ful to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded unto my self at the first, for measuring the reigns of these Egyptian Kings. The years which passed from the fifth of Rehoboam, unto the fourth of Jehojakim, I so divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of reign is uncertain; that is, upon this Sethon. By this accompt I find the thirty three years that are set down by Functius, to agree very nearly, if not precisely, with the time of Sethon's reign; therefore I conform my own reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one year less. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affairs growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I return.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasses, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

The wickedness of Manasses. His imprisonment, repentance, and death.

MAnasse the Son of Ezechias, forgetting the piety of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned and furnished all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Devil was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himself esteemed the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, with all the Hoast of heaven, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his sons for a Sacrifice to the Devil Moloch or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devils.

He also gave himself to all kind of Witchcraft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent bloud, as Jerusalem was repleniished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Jews affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet near unto the Fountain of Siloe, to be sawn in sunder with a wodden Saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeed are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captains of the Hoast of the Kings of Ashur, which took Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where, after he had lyen twenty years as a captive, and dispoiled of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continual prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Assyrians heart to deliver him: 2 Chron. 33. 11.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was again established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickedness, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed form, detested his former fooliish and devilliish Idolatry, and cast down the Idols of his own erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and dyed after the long reign of fifty five years. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cage of iron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may believe as it shall please their fancies.

§. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reign of Psammiticus.

THat the wickedness of King Manasses was the cause of the evil which fell upon his Kingdome and person, any Christian must needs believe: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things in those parts of the World such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, upon respect born to his own ends, desirous to enlarge his Empire) to make attempt upon Juda. For the kingdom of Egypt, which was become the pillar whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civill dissention, and after two years ill amended by a division of the government between twelve Princes. After some good agreement between these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their collegues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himself absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meer Anarchie that was in Egypt, with the division of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore who omitteth Sethon, between the reign of Sabacus and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelve Governours immediatly before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissention seems to have bin the uncertainty of title to that Kingdom (for that the crown of Egypt passed by succession of bloud, I have often shewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not settled untill one had obtained the Soverainty.

These twelve Rulers governed fifteen years in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made strait covenant and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Vulcan's Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this unity lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion; which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Meris; a work so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could give it commendation answerable to the statelinesse of the work it self, I will not here set down that unperfect description which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to say that he prefers it far before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest works in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have bin the work of Marus or Menides, a King which lived five generations before Proteus, that is before the Warr of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dædalus took the pattern of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reyneccius takes him to have bin Annemenes, which reigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore, for Dædalus & Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reyneccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Chæremon and others, that are found in Josephus, touching Amenophis and his children to the story of Amasis and Actisanes the Æthiopian mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethon's Amenophis to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Actisanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture, the times which we now handle are those about which Reyneccius hath erred in making search Amasis was Anysis, Actisanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelve Princes to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actisanes the Æthiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Æthiopian deposed Anysis; Actisanes governed well, and was mild in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Actisanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (saving Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to hear the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodore believed the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, which was familiar with them in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might add, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, do help to prove that it was the work of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemn feast in Vulcan's Temple, when they were to make their drink-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himself, brought forth no more than eleven Cups, Hereupon, Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, took off his brazen Helmet; and therewith supplyed the want, This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traytor, yet, when they found that it was done by him upon set purpose or ill intent, they forbear to kill him, but being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event is held by Diodore as a fable, which

I believe to have bin none other: In the reſt Herodotus and Diodore agree, ſaying that Pſammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whoſe aid he vanquiſht his Companions, and made himſelf ſole King.

The years of his reign, according to Herodotus, were fifty four; according to Euſebius, forty four; Mercator, to reconcile theſe two, gives forty four years to his ſingle reign, and ten to his ruling joyntly with the Princes before ſpoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted, being a man grown (for he cannot in reaſon be ſuppoſed to have been then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve Governours, muſt be thought to have lived unto extream age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threeſcore and nine years. I therefore yield rather to Euſebius; but will not adventure to cut five years from the Ariſtocraty: though peradventure Pſammiticus was not at firſt one of the twelve, but ſucceeded (either by election, or as next of blood) into the place of ſome Prince that dyed, and was ten years companion in that government.

Another ſcruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The years of the Egyptians, as we find them ſet down, are more by one, than ſerve to fill up the time between the fift of Rehoboam and the fourth of Jehojakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we muſt abate one year from Sethon's reign, that was of uncertain length, or elſe (which I had rather do, becauſe Funccius may have followed better authority than I know, or than himſelf alledgeth, in giving to Sethon a time ſo nearly agreeing with the truth) we muſt confound the laſt year of one reign with the firſt of another. Such a ſuppoſition were not inſolent. For no man can ſuppoſe, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are ſet down in Chronologicall tables, reigned preciſely ſo many years as are aſcribed unto them, without any fractions: it is enough to think that the ſurpluſage of one mans times ſupplyed the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the laſt year of thoſe fifteen, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the firſt of Pſammiticus; who ſurely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himſelf Lord alone all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the firſt in Egypt who entertained any ſtrait amity with the Greeks; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gave large rewards and poſſeſſions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by beſtowing them in the left wing of his Army, whileſt his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made in Syria. Upon this diſgrace it is ſaid, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thouſand, forſook their natural Country of Egypt, and went into Æthiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Meſſages, nor by the King himſelf, who over-took them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wives and Children, they anſwered, that their weapons ſhould get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

It is alſo reported of him, That he cauſed two Infants to be brought up in ſuch ſort, as they might not hear any word ſpoken; by which means, he hoped to find out what Nation or Language was moſt ancient; foraſmuch as it ſeemed likely, that nature would teach the children to ſpeak that Language which men ſpake at the firſt. The iſſue hereof was, that the children cryed, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to ſignifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, ſerved greatly to magnify the Phrygian antiquity. Goropius, Becanus makes no ſmall matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker ſignifies (as Baker in Engliſh) a maker of bread. He that will turn over any part of Goropius his works, may find enough of this kind, to perſwade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarks uſed none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confuſion of languages at Babel, the name it ſelf of Babel being alſo Dutch, and given by occaſion of this confuſion; for that there they began to babble and talk one knew not what.

But I will not inſiſt upon all that is written of Pſammiticus. The moſt regardable of his acts was the ſiege of Azotus in Paleſtina, about which he ſpent nine and twenty years. Never have we heard (ſaith Herodotus) that any City endured ſo long a ſiege as this; yet Pſammiticus carryed it at the laſt. This Town of Azotus had been won by Tartan a Captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it ſeemeth, relieved, but in vain, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out ſo well.

§. III.

What reference theſe Egyptian matters might have to the impriſonment and enlargement of Manaſſes. In what part of his reign Manaſſes was taken priſoner.

WEre it certainly known, in what year of his reign Manaſſes was taken priſoner, soner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty, I think we should find these Egyptian troubles to have been no small occasion both of his captivity and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that even they, who intended onely their own business, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the civil Wars of Egypt that followed upon the death of Sethon, or the renting of the Kingdom, as it were, into twelve pieces, or the War between Psalmmiticus and his Collegues, or the expedition of Psalmmiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister unto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts, or such necessity of sending an Army into those parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him to make sure work with the King of Juda. The same occasion sufficed also to procure the delivery of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Josephus hath it) by subtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, win his Countrey, but onely wast it. So that the Jews, having learned wit by the ill success of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain upon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty argument of hope and fear, than the little Kingdom of Juda could afford) had no reason to spend his forces in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quiting his present advantage over the Jews, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manasses his reign, wherein he was taken prisoner; or concerning his captivity it self, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Josephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Torniellus three opinions: the one of Bellarmine, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth year of his reign; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronology, who affirms, that it was in his twenty seventh year; the third of Rabbi Kimki upon Ezechiel, who saith, that he was forty years an Idolater, and lived fifteen years after his repentance. The first of their conjectures is upheld by Torniellus, who rejects the second, as more unprobable, and condemns the third as most false. Yet the reasons alledged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the opinion, are such, as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinal as far as he may, (for where need requires, he doth freely dissent from him) than to have used his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gave his judgment. Two arguments he brings to maintain the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon the son of Manasses, is said by Josephus to have followed the works of his fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses grown old in his sins, it is like that he should have continued, as he did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason why the sins of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve years old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimki) untill he was but fifteen years from death. Touching the second; howsoever it be a fearfull thing, to cast off unto the last those good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sins which are not forsaken before the age of two and fifty years, shall be punished with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manasses continued longer in his wickedness than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimki hath affirmed. In the second book of Kings, the evill which Manasses did, is remembred at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; so that his amendment may seem to have taken up no great part of his life? the storie of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? the other place is in the four and twentieth Chapter of the same Book, where, in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Jehojakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sins of Manasses, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he shed (for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who so considers well these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier than fifteen years before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seven years old, he repented, and becomming a new man, lived in the fear of God forty years after. I will no longer diſpute about this matter, ſeeing that the truth cannot be diſcovered. It ſufficeth to ſay, that two years of civill diſſentions in Egypt fourteen or fifteen years following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened by partition of the Soveraigntie: the war of Pſammiticus againſt his Aſſociates: and four and twenty years of the nine and twenty, wherein the ſiege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manaſſes, did leave no one part of his reign (after the firſt fifteen years) free from the danger of being oppreſſed by the Babylonian, whoſe men of war had continuall occaſions of viſiting his Countrey. All which I will adde hereto, is this; that the fifteenth of Manaſſes was the laſt year of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reign, or (accounting from the death of Aſarhaddon) the twentieth: The ſeven and twentieth of Manaſſes was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Pſammiticus. and the fifth of Nabulaſſar, the ſon of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of theſe was the year of his impriſonment, or whether any other, I forbear to ſhew mine opinion, leſt I ſhould thereby ſeem to draw all matters over-violently to mine own computation.

This was the firſt great maſterie that the Babylonians had of the kingdome of Juda. For though Achaz promiſed Tribute to Salmanaſſar, yet Ezechias never payed it. True it is, that he hoped to ſtay Senacherib's enterpriſe againſt him, by preſenting him with three hundred talents of ſilver, and thirty of gold, beſides the plate which covered the doores and pillars of the Temple. 2 Kin. 18.

But Manaſſes being preſſed with great neceſſitie, could refuſe no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impoſe upon him; among which it ſeems, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of ſervitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whileſt they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not only by his fortifiing with men of war all the ſtrong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather againſt Pſammiticus, whoſe party he had forſaken than againſt the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controverſie) but likewiſe by that oppoſition, which Joſias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in favour of Nabulaſſar, which had been againſt all reaſon and policie, if it had not been his dutie by covenant. Of this I will ſpeak more in convenient place.

§. IV.

Of the firſt and ſecond Meſſenian Wars, which were in the reigns of Ezechia and Manaſſes, Kings of Juda.

NOw concerning ſuch actions as were performed abroad in the world, about theſe times of Manaſſes, the moſt remarkable were the Meſſenian Wars; which happened in this age, and being the greateſt action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Perſian Wars, deſerve not to be paſſed over with ſilence.

The firſt Meſſenian War began and ended in the daies of Ezechia; the ſecond in the reign of Manaſſes: but to avoyd the trouble of interrupting our Hiſtorie, I have thought it beſt to rehearſe them both in this place. Other introduction is needleſſe, than to ſay, that the poſteritie of Hercules, driving the iſſue of Pelops and the Achæans out of their ſeats, divided their lands between themſelves, and erected the kingdomes of Lacedæmon, Argos, Meſſene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a vvhile, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and ſought one anothers ruine with bloody wars; whereof theſe Meſſenian were the greateſt.

The pretended grounds of the Meſſenian war are ſcarce worth remembrance, they were ſo ſlight. Ambition was the true cauſe of it: vvherewith the Lacedæmonians were ſo tranſported, that any thing ſerved them as a colour to accompliſh their greedy deſires. Yet other matter was alledged; namely, that one Polychares a Meſſenian had ſlain many Lacedæmonians, for which the Magiſtrates of Sparta deſiring to have him yeilded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Meſſenians on the other ſide, excuſed Polychares, for that he was grown frantick, through injuries received from Euæphnes a Lacedæmonian. This Euæphnes had bargained to give paſture to the Cattel of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increaſe: but not contented with the gain appointed, he ſold the Cattel, and ſlaves that keep them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a fair tale to his friend, ſaying, that they were ſtollen. Whilſt the lye was yet ſcarce out of his mouth, one of the ſlaves that had eſcaped from the Merchants came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confeſſed all, and promiſed large amends; which to receive he carried the ſon of Polychares home with him, but having him at home, he villanouſly ſlew him. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians having refuſed, after long ſute made by the wretched

Father,

Father, to do him right against this Theife and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrel out of those things which he did in that madness, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compremise, or stand unto the judgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the general Council of Greece, or to any other fair course. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great desire to occupie the fair Country of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough to have some shew for their doings; which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly took an oath to hold War with Messene till they had mastered it: which done, they seized upon Amphia, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Messenians took Arms, and were met by the Enemy. A furious battel was fought between them, which ended not until dark night, with uncertain victory. The Messenians did strongly encamp themselves; The Lacedæmonians, unable to force their Camp, returned home. This War began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twenty years. The two enemy Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces, the Lacedæmonians wasting the inland parts of Messene; and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, took part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third, and fourth battel were fought, with as great obstinacy as the first; saving that in the fourth battel the Lacedæmonians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other fights, the victory was still uncertain, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphaes their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many years were spent ere all this blood was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertain Souldiers, caused the war to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their inland towns, excepting Ithome, which was a Mountain with a Town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to do. But, as some Authors tell us, the Lacedæmonians were so obstinate in this War, because of their vow, that having absented themselves ten years from Sparta, their wives sent them word, that their City would grow unpeopled, by reason that no children had been born them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their ableſt young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in process of this Messenian War, when the Devil in an Oracle had advised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of* Ægyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedæmonians; the lot falling upon the Daughter of one Lyciscus, Epibolus the Priest, willing to save her, said, she was only a fostered child, and not born of the wife of Lyciscus: which answer giving delay to the execution of the Maid, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young Nobleman, being in love with the Maid, when otherwise he could not prevail, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had defloured her, & got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters belly to disprove the Lovers slander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitions, into dispair of prevailing against the Lacedæmonians, he slew himself, to the great hurt of his Countrey, which he loved most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craved peace, which they obtained with most rigorous conditions. Half the yearly fruits of their Land they were bound to send unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make solemn lamentations at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworn to live in true subjection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territory was taken from them, which was given to the Asmæi, and such as had followed the Spartans in this War.

This peace being made upon so uneven terms, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty years it continued (the Messenians not finding how to help themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious War than the former. The able young men, that were grown up in the room of those Messenians whom the former War had consumed, began to consider their own strength and multitude, thinking themselves equal to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore scorned to serve such Masters as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chief of these was Aristomenes, a Noble Gentleman of the house of Ægyptus; who perceiving the uniform desires of his Country-men, adventured to become their Leader. He therefore sounding the affections of the Argives and Arcadians, which he found throughly answerable to his purpose, began open war upon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedæmonians hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their own without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battel was fought between them, and a doubtfull; save that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords to think them their equalls. Particularly; the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one year another battel was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to help; the Messenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudy fight; but Aristomenes did so behave himself, that finally he made the Enemies run for their lives. Of such importance was this victory, that the Lacedæmonians began to bethink themselves of making some good agreement. But one Tyrtæus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-inforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes took by surprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set upon him in hope to have recovered the booty.

But all those victories of Aristomenes perished, in the loss of one battell, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell upon the Lacedæmonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruel butchery. The loss was so great, that together with Andania their principal City, all the Towns of Messene, standing too far from the Sea, were abandoned for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conveyed into a place of safety. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For besides that Era it self was a strong piece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the siege. He wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattel, and all provisions, necessary for his own people, the Slaves and houshold stuffe he changed into money, suffering the owners to redeem them. To remedy this mischief, the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoyning parts of their own Countrey, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtæus appeased this uprore with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not onely ranged over all the fields, but adventured upon the Towns, surprised, and sackt Amyclæ, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other services, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner; yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembred, as a thing very strange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to set upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senseless, and carried away prisoner, with fifty of his Companions. There was a deep natural Cave into which the Spartans used to cast head-long such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adjudged. All the rest of these poor men dyed with their falls; Aristomenes (howsoever it came to pass) took no harm. Yet was it harm enough to be imprisoned in a deep Dungeon, among dead carkasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Fox that was gnawing upon a dead body. Hereupon he bethought himself, that this beast must needs know some way to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the tail with one hand, saved himself from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coat into the mouth of it. So letting it creep whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, untill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Fox being loose, ran through a hole at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delve so long with his nails, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was received. But when the Corinthian forces that came to help the Lacedæmonians in the siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains slain, and their Camp taken; then was it easily beleived, that Aristomenes was alive indeed.

Thus eleven years passed whilest the enemies hovering abour Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slave that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdness the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainy-winter-night, that the husband came home unlooked for, whilst the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him by what good fortune hee was returned so soon. He told her, that the storm of foul weather was such, as had made all his fellows leave their Stations, and that himself had done as the rest did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not look abroad neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would stir in such a dark rainy night as this was. This slave that heard these tidings, rose up secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Camp with the news. There he found Emperamus his Master commanding in the Kings absence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarm was presently taken; and the extream darkness, together with the noise of wind and rain, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruel fight; one part being incited by meer hope ending a long work, the other enraged by meer desperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the assistance which women and children (to whom the hatred of servitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowness of the streets and other passages, which admitted not many to fight at once. But the Messenians were in continual toyl; their Enemies fought in course, refreshing themselves with meat and sleep, and then returning supplyed the place of their weary fellows with fresh Companions. Aristomenes therefore, perceiving that his men for want of relief were no longer able to hold out, (as having been three days and three nights vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirst, besides continual rain and cold) gathered together all the weaker sort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to break out through the midst of the Enemies. Emperamus General of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this; and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a fair passage to these desperate mad-men. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Arcadia, where they were most lovingly entertained.

Upon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue: but Aristocrates their fall-hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was already lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in safety, he chose out five hundred the lustiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret hast into Sparta, hoping to find the Town secure, and ill manned, the people being run forth to the spoyl of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recover their own, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyn with him; but Aristocrates marred all, by sending speedy advertisement thereof to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anaxander sent back to Aristocrates was intercepted by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falshood, which being published in open assembly, the Arcadians stoned him to death, and casting forth his body unburied, erected a monument of his treachery, with a note, That the Perjurer cannot deceive God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people, to the charge of his son Gorgus and other sufficient Governours, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, he resolved himself to make aboad in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedæmonians work at home. His daughters he bestowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, took to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the best man in Greece. Finally Aristomenes went with his his daughter to Rhodes, when he purpoſed to have travelled unto Ardys the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Meſſenians vvere invited by Anaxilas (vvhoſe great Grandfather vvas a Meſſenian, and vvent into Italy after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italy, to take his part againſt the Zanclæans in Sicily, on the other ſide of the Streights. They did ſo; and vvinning the Town of Zancle, called it Meſſene, vvhich name it keeps to this day.

This ſecond Meſſenian vvar ended in the firſt year of the twenty eighth Olympiad. Long after vvhich time, the reſt of that Nation, vvho ſtaying at home ſerved the Lacedæmonians, found means to rebell; but vvere ſoon vanquiſhed, and being driven to forſake Peloponneſus, they vvent into Acarnania; vvhence likewiſe, after few ages, they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their ancient Country-men into Italy and Sicily; ſome of them went into Africa, where they choſe unto themſelves a ſeat.

It is very ſtrange, that during two hundred and fourſcore years, this baniſhed Nation retained their name, their ancient cuſtoms, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forſaken Country; with a deſire to return unto it. In the third year of the hundred and ſecond Olympiad, the great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, revoked the Meſſenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponneſus. There did Epaminondas reſtore unto them their old poſſeſſion, and help them in building a fair City; which by the name of the Province, was called Meſſene, and was held by them ever after, in deſpight of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they never from thenceforth ſtood in fear.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manaſſes reigned. Whether Deioces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Book of Judith. Of the Hiſtory of Judith.

Ardys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are ſpoken of by Pauſanias, as reigning ſhortly after the Meſſenian war, Ardys ſucceeding unto his father Gyges, began his reign of nine and forty years, in the ſecond of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the ſteps of his father, vvho encroached upon the Ionians in Aſia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like maner Ardys wan Priene, and aſſailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reign, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own country by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Aſia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grandchild, by whom they were driven out. They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wan the City of Sardes; though the Caſtle or Citadel thereof was defended againſt them and held ſtill for King Ardys; whoſe long reign was unable, by reaſon of this great ſtorm, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King until the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was ſix years after the Meſſenian war ended; the ſame being the laſt years of Manaſſes his reign over Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, vvas King of Media, three & fifty of theſe five and fifty years in which Manaſſes reigned. This Deioces was the firſt that ruled the Medes in a ſtrict form, commanding more abſolutely than his Predeceſſours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people ſo much licence, as cauſed every one to deſire the wholeſome ſeverity of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces anſwered their deſires to the full. For he cauſed them to build for him a ſtately Palace; he took unto him a Guard; for defence of his perſon; he ſeldom gave preſence; vvhich alſo vvhen he did, it vvas vvith ſuch auſterity, that no man durſt preſume to ſpit or cough in his ſight. By theſe and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly upheld the Majeſty which his predeceſſours had almoſt letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royal Office, he did uprightly and ſeverely adminiſter juſtice, keeping ſecret ſpies to inform him of all that vvas done in the Kingdom. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion by encroaching upon others, but ſtudied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and ſuch as were before him, ſeems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Deioces was the firſt who reigned in Media. Herod. l. 1.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he ſhould be that king Arphaxad, mentioned in the ſtory of Judith, as alſo Ben Merodach, by the ſame account, ſhould be Nabuchodonoſor the Aſſyrian, by whom Arphaxad was ſlain, and Holofernes ſent to work wonders upon Phul and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last year of Deioces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In fitting this book of Judith to a certain time, there hath been much labour spent with ill success. The reigns of Cambyses, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been sought into, but afford no great matter of likelyhood and now of late, the times foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have been thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the story; though others herein cannot (I speak of such as fain would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not re-built, which in the story of Judith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this History; and above all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose judgment the authority of this Book were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchy, inclines the matter to the reign of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the business. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a return from captivity lately foregoing; the Temple re-built; Joachim High Priest; and a long peace of threescore and ten years, or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jews. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteen years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jews refused to assist; one that sought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Viceroy or Captain General knew not the Jewish Nation, but was fain to learn what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances; the Priesthood of Joachim, with a return from captivity, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the re-building of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reign of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before nor after the captivity of the Jews, and desolation of the City. Wherefore the brief decision of this controversie is, That the book of Judith is not Canonical. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and re-edified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted; he adds, that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is, five or six years, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have been so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor, having vanquished and slain Arphaxad, might then seek to make himself Lord of all, by the Army which he sent forth unto Holofernes. So should the Jews have done their duty, in adhering to Xerxes their Sovereign Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applyed to the argument. For in these times, the affairs of Jury were agreeable to the History of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jews, and as proud as we shall need to think him: But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief from this conjecture: and the supposition it self is very hard, that a Rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Army consisting of seventeen hundred thousand men, should presume so far, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Archers on horse back, as to think that he might do what he list, yea that there was none other God than himself. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be said against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity of holding the book of Judith to be Canonical, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all do, the text it self. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmine (whose works I have not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proved by many arguments. That she lived not in the Reign of Manasses, Torniellus hath proved very substantially, shewing how the Cardinal is driven, as it were to break through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the the deſtruction of the Temple foregoing her time, that the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonoſor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meer fantaſie, it is ſo plain that it needs no proof at all. Wherefore we may truly ſay, that they, which have contended about the time of this Hiſtory, being well furniſhed of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themſelves (like naked men in a ſtony field) have chaſed Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni ſoliſque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Surely, to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over againſt Arabia; or the Countries of Phul and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Coſmographers, as the former queſtion hath done Chronologers. But I will not buſie my ſelf herewith; having already ſo far digreſſed, in ſhewing who lived not with Manaſſes, that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearſe what others I find, to have had their part, in the long time of his Reign.

Judit. 2. 13 & 25.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in theſe times.

THE firſt year of Manaſſes was the laſt Romulus; after whoſe death, one year the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabyne choſen, a peaceable man, and ſeeming very religious in his kind. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in Wars, to ſome good civility, and a more orderly faſhion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with ſuperſtition; as perſwading them, that he had familiarity with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all theſe devices of Numa were in his own judgement, no better than meer deluſions, that ſerved only as rudiments to bring the ſavage multitude of theeves and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to ſome form of milder diſcipline, than their boyſterous and wild natures were otherwiſe apt to entertain. This appeared by the Books that were found in his grave, almoſt ſix hundred years after his death, wherein the Superſtition taught by himſelf was condemned as vain. His grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Cheſts of ſtone were in it, with an inſcription in Greek and Latine letters, which ſaid, that Numa Pompilius, the ſon of Pompo, King of the Romans, lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being utterly conſumed. In the other were his Books, wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own conſtitutions ſeven, and other ſeven of Philoſophy. They were not onely uncorrupted, but in a manner freſh and new. The Pretour of the City deſiring to have a ſight of theſe Books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refuſed to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a ſolemn oath that they were againſt the Religion then in uſe. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to be openly burnt. It ſeems that Numa did mean to acquit himſelf unto wiſer ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not been ſo fooliſh as to believe the Doctrine wherein he inſtructed his own barbarous times. But the poyſon wherewith he had infected Rome, when he ſate in his Throne, had not left working, when he miniſtred the Antidote out of his grave. Had theſe Books not come to light untill the days of Tully and Cæſar, when the miſt of ignorance was ſomewhat better diſcuſſed: likely it is that they had not only eſcaped the fire, but wrought ſome good (and peradventure general) effect. Being as it was, they ſerved as a confutation, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inveterate.

Numa reigned three and forty years in continual peace. After him Tullus Hoſtilius the third King was choſen, in the ſix and fortieth of Manaſſes, and reigned two and thirty years, buſied, for the moſt part, in War. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cauſe to fear, that might grow unto them from the Thuſcanes, cauſed them to bethink themſelves of a courſe, whereby without effuſion of ſo much bloud, as might make them too weak for a common enemy, it might be decided, who ſhould command, and who obey.

There were in each Camp three Brethren, Twins, born at one birth (Dionyſius ſays that they were Couſin Germans) of equal years and ſtrength, who were appointed to fight for their ſeveral Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Companions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them firſt loſt their lives. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Livy tels it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their oppoſites were ſlain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reaſon of their hurts, could not follow him with equal ſpeed, to follow him at ſuch diſtance one from another, that returning upon them, he ſlew them, as it had been in ſingle fight, man after man, ere they could joyn together and ſet upon him at once. Dionyſius reports it ſomewhat otherwiſe, telling very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and ſaying, that firſt one of the Horatii was ſlain, then one of the Curatii, then a ſecond Horatius, and laſtly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly ſever the one from the other, as is ſhewed before.

This is one of the moſt memorable things in the old Roman Hiſtory, both in regard of the action it ſelf, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wager, againſt Alba; and in reſpect of the great increaſe which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the City of Alba did immediately become ſubject unto her own Colony, and was ſhortly after, upon ſome treacherous dealing of their Governour, utterly razed, the people being removed unto Rome where they were made Citizens. The ſtrong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother City, had been chief, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not ſubject unto it, and divers petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were ſmall, yet many, I will forbear to rehearſe (as being the works of ſundry ages, and few of them remarkable conſidered apart by themſelves) until ſuch time as the fourth Empire, that is now in the infancy, ſhall grow to be the main ſubject of this Hiſtory.

The ſeventh year of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the firſt of Manaſſes. Alſo the three laſt Governours for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the ſame Kings time. Of theſe I find only names, Leocrates, Abſander, and Erizias. After Erizias yearly Rulers were elected.

Theſe Governours for ten years were alſo of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was ſhortned, and from term of life reduced unto ten years, it being thought likely that they would govern the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, in applying their times unto thoſe years of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological Table, following this work, doth ſet them. For he not only profeſſeth himſelf to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the years of the Greeks, how they did anſwer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Hiſtory. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the firſt year of the ſeventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the ſame was the firſt year of Charops government of Athens; I hope I ſhall not need excuſe, for varying from Pauſanias, who ſets the beginning of theſe Athenians ſomewhat ſooner. Dion. Halic. l. 1. fol. 43. & 45.

In the reign of Manaſſes it was, that Midas, whom the Poets feigned to have had Aſſes ears, held the Kingdom of Phrygia. Many fables were deviſed of him; eſpecially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he ſhould touch might immediately be changed into Gold: by which means he had like to have been ſtarved (his meat and drink being ſubject to the ſame transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from this miſerable faculty, by cauſing him to waſh himſelf in the River Pactolus, the ſtream whereof hath ever ſince, forſooth, abounded in that precious metall. Finally, it is ſaid he dyed by drinking Bulls blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flouriſhed that Antimachus, who (ſaith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obſerved the Moons Eclipſe at the foundation of Rome.

The Mileſians, or, (as Euſebius hath it) the Athenians having obtained ſome power by Sea, founded Macicratis a City on the Eaſt of Egypt. Pſammiticus herein ſeems to have aſſiſted them, who uſed all means of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his ſureſt ſtrength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power ſufficient to plant a Colony in Egypt by force.

About this time Archias and his companion Miſcellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracuſæ in Sicily, a City in after times exceeding famous. Plut. & Euſeb.

The City of Nicodemia, ſometime Aſtacus*, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus, according to Pauſanias, lived much about this time. * Whence in Strabo there is ſinus Aſtacenus a part of Propontis where this City ſtandeth.

About theſe times alſo was Croton founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Miſcellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracuſæ. Strabo makes it ſomewhat more ancient, and ſo doth Pauſanias. Pauſ. l. 5. Hal. l. 3. Strab l. 6.

About the ſame time the Parthenians being of age, and baniſhed Lacedæmon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italy; where it is ſaid they founded Tarentum: but Juſtine and Pauſanias find it built before, and by Juſtin. l. 3. Pauſ. l. 10.

them conquered and amplified: and about the ſame time, Manaſſe yet living, the City Phaſelis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Umbrii, now Urbin in Italy. About which time alſo Chalcedon in Aſia, over againſt Byzantium (now Conſtantinople) was founded by the Megarenſes, who therefore were upbraided as blind, becauſe they choſe not the other ſide of Boſphorus. It were a long work to rehearſe all that is ſaid to have been done in the five and fifty years of Manaſſes: that which already hath been told is enough; the reſt being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reſerving only Ben Merodach, and Nabulaſſar, to the buſineſs that will ſhortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manaſſes to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

Of Ammon and Joſias.

2 Kin. 21. 2 Chro 33. Ammon the ſon of Manaſſe, a man no leſs wicked than was his Father before his converſion, reſtored the exerciſe of all ſorts of Idolatry: for which God hardned the hearts of his own ſervants againſt him, who ſlew him after he had reigned two years. Philo, Euſebius, and Nicephorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint.

Joſias ſucceeded unto Ammon, being but a child of 8. years old, he began to ſeek after the God of David his Father; and in his twelfth year he purged Juda and Jeruſalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake down in his ſight the Altars of Baalim: He cauſed all the Images, as well thoſe which were graven, as molten, to be ſtampt to powder, and ſtrewed on their graves that had erected them; and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He alſo ſlew thoſe that ſacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and cauſed the Chariots and Horſes of the Sun to be burnt. Of Joſias it was propheſied in the time of Jeroboam the firſt, when he erected the Golden Calf at Bethel, that a child ſhould be born unto the houſe of David, Joſias by name, and upon thee (ſaid the Prophet, ſpeaking to the Altar) ſhall he ſacrifice the Prieſts of the high places, that burn Incenſe upon thee: a prophecy very remarkable.

2 Kin. 22. 2 Chro. 34. 1 Kin. 13.

In the eighteenth year of his reign, he rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Prieſt found the Book of Moſes, called Deutronomy, or, of the Law, which he ſent to the King: which when he had cauſed to be read before him, and conſidered of the ſevere commandements therein written, the proſperity promiſed to thoſe that obſerve them, and the ſorrow and extirpation to the reſt, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to ask counſel of the Propheteſs Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book; who anſwered the meſſengers in theſe words: Thus ſaith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evil upon the place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curſes that are written in the Book which they have read before the King of Juda, becauſe they have forſaken me, and burnt Incenſe to other gods. Only for the King himſelf, becauſe he was a lover of God and his Laws, it was promiſed that this evil ſhould not fall on Juda and Jeruſalem in his daies, but that he himſelf ſhould inherit his grave in peace.

2 Chro. 34. 21. 2 King. 22. 15. 2 Chro. 34.

Joſias aſſembled the Elders, cauſed the Book to be read unto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and cauſed all that were found in Jeruſalem and Benjamin to do the like, promiſing thereby to obſerve the Laws and Commandements in the Book contained.

The execution done by Joſias upon the Altar, Idols, Monuments, and bones of the falſe Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto thoſe Countries, that had been part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Yet I do not think, that any victory of Joſias in war got poſſeſſion of theſe places; but rather that Ezechias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach oppoſed himſelf againſt Aſarhaddon, did uſe the advantage which the faction in the North preſented unto him, and laid hold upon ſo much of the Kingdom of Iſrael, as he was able to people. Otherwiſe alſo it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himſelf self unable to deal with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Town held out nine and twenty years) did give unto Manasses, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himself could not easily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone between them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Jews, which had been lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereave them of their own. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captains of War in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such business is intimated, as the taking possession and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much pains, in making Jerusalem it self more defensible; yet I should rather believe, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himself against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such provisions only for his minds sake. The earnestness of Josias in the King of Babel his quarrel, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made with that King or his Ancestor, was upon such friendly terms, as required not only a faithful observation, but a thankfull requital. For no perswasions could suffice to make Josias sit still, and hold himself quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Necho King of Egypt passed along by him, to war upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

2 Chro. 33 14.

The last year of Josias his reign it was, when as Necho the son of Psammiticus, came with a powerful Army towards the border of Judæa, determining to pass that way, being the neerest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River about Carchemish, or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Diocletian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done,) or perhaps to invade Syria it self. For it seemeth that the travail of Psammiticus had not been idlely consumed about that one Town of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters that had formerly belonged unto the Adades Kings of Damasco.

2 Chro. 35 20.

Neither was the industry of Necho less than his Fathers had been, in pursuing the war against Babel. In which war, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affairs and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it self could afford; and the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feel it self better, and to shew what it could do. These were great helps, but of shorter endurance than was the war; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldæans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Egypt into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharao Necho ascended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, having their Swords drawn, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Josias advised with himself to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory set in the midway between both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were so that Necho himself desired, by his Embassadours, leave to pass along by Judæa, protesting that he directed himself against the Assyrians only, without all harmful purpose against Josias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him. 2 Chro. 35.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholy trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezechia, whilst that good King and his people relied upon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proof, to shew the ill assurance that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (near neighbours though they were) were alwaies unready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seek to have the Jews renew their ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Army, as did, soon after this, out-face Nabulassar upon his own borders, left unto the Jews, a lawful excuſe of fear, had they forborn to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I believe that this religious and vertuous Prince Joſias, was not ſtirred up only by politick reſpects, to ſtop the way of Neco; but thought himſelf bound in Faith and Honour, to do his beſt in defence of the Babylonian Crown; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by Covenant made at the enlargement of Manaſſes, or by the gift of ſuch part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occaſion to ſhew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendſhip was, and to the Egyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some think that this Action of Joſias was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the Prophet; which I do not find in the Prophecie of Jeremy, nor can find reaſon to believe. Others hold opinion that he forgat to aſk the Counſel of God: and this is very likely; ſeeing he might believe that an enterpriſe grounded upon fidelity and thankfulneſs due to the King of Babel, could not but be diſpleaſing unto the Lord. But the wickedneſs of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken ſuch root, as all the care of Joſias in reforming the Land, could not pluck up) was queſtionleſs far from hearkening how the matter would ſtand with Gods pleaſure, and much farther from enquiring into his ſecret Will, wherein it was determined that their good King, whoſe life ſtood between them and their puniſhment, ſhould now be taken from among them, and that in ſuch ſort, as his death ſhould give an entrance to the miſeries enſuing. So Joſias levying all the ſtrength he could make, near unto Megiddo, in the half Tribe of Manaſſes, encountred Neco: and there he received the ſtroke of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jeruſalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Anceſtors. His loſs was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, eſpecially of Jeremy the Prophet, who inſerted a ſorrowful remembrance thereof in his Book of Lamentations.

Lam 4.10.

§. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Joſias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehojakim Kings of Iſrael.

OF theſe Wars, and particularly of this Victory, Herodotus hath mention among the Acts of Neco. He tells us of this King, that he went about to make a Channel, whereby Ships might paſs out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It ſhould have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middeſt of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians ſhould have the benefit of it, which cauſed Neco to deſiſt when half was done. There were conſumed in this toylſome buſineſs twelve hundred thouſand Egyptians; a loſs great enough to make the King forſake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howſoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and levied a great Army, wherewith he marched againſt the King of Babel. In this Expedition, he uſed the ſervice, as well of his Navy, as of his Land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, ſave only this victory againſt Joſias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolus, and the Jews Syrians; which is a ſmall error, ſeeing that Judæa was a Province of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to have been the ſame place (though diverſly named) in which this battel was fought. After this, Necus took the City of Cadytis, which was perhaps Carchemiſh, by Euphrates, and made himſelf Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Joſephus witneſſeth.

Joſ. Ant. Jud. lib. 10. cap. 7.

Particularly we find, that the Phœnicians one of the moſt powerful Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they ſurrounded all Africa, ſetting ſail from the Gulf of Arabia, and ſo paſſing along all the coaſt, whereon they both landed, as need required, and ſowed Corn for their ſuſtenance in that long voyage, which laſted three years. This was the firſt Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was diſcovered; which after was forgotten, until Vaſco de Gama the Portingal found it out, following a contrary courſe to that which the Phœnicians held; for they beginning in the Eaſt, ran the way of the Sun, South and then Weſtward, after which they returned home by the pillars and ſtreights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the ſtreights of Gibraltar, having Africk ſtill on the right hand; but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not far from the ſame ſtreights, leave Africk on the Larboord, and bend their courſe unto the Eaſt. That report of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus durſt not believe, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is, on the North ſide of them, is a matter of neceſſary truth; and the obſervation then made hereof, makes me the better to believe, that ſuch a voyage was indeed performed. But leaving theſe diſcourſes of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his eſtate. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were buſie at Charchemiſh, had made Jehoahaz their King, in the room of his father Joſias. The Prophet Jeremy calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the ſhort reign of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Iſrael reigned but one moneth; Jehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldeſt ſon of Joſias: Wherefore it may ſeem that he was ſet up as the beſt affected unto the King of Babel; the reſt of his houſe being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appears by the ſequel. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had diſpatched his buſineſs in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Judæa. This Country was now ſo far from making any reſiſtance, that the King himſelf came from Riblah in the land of Hamath, where the matter went ſo ill on his ſide, that Neco did caſt him into bonds, and carry him priſoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdom to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The City of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be obſerved in divers examples. Yet here Jehojakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdom; an ill gain, ſince he could no better uſe it. But however Jehojakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao ſped well, making that Kingdom Tributary, without any ſtroke ſtricken; which three moneths before was too ſtout to give him peace, when he deſired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to waſt his forces upon Judæa: but now the reputation of his good ſucceſs at Megiddo, and Charchemiſh, together with the diſſention of the Princes Joſias his ſons (of whom the eldeſt is probably thought to have ſtormed at the preferment of his younger brother) gave him power to do even what ſhould pleaſe himſelf. Yet he did forbear to make a conqueſt of the Land, perhaps upon the ſame reaſon, which had made him ſo earneſt in ſeeking to hold peace with it. For the Jews had ſuffered much in the Egyptians quarrel, and being left by theſe their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven of neceſſity to forſake that party, and to joyn with the enemies; to whom if they ſhewed themſelves faithful, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them; ſeeing they were ſuch a people as would not upon every occaſion ſhift ſide, but endure more than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth ſhould lay upon them: ſo good a Patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheleſs, he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of ſilver, and one Talent of gold; that ſo he might both reap at the preſent ſome fruit of his pains taken, and leave unto them ſome document in the future, of greater puniſhment than verbal anger, due to them, if they ſhould rebel. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King Johoahaz, who died in his Captivity.

Jer. 22. 32

2 King. 34 32.

The reign of Jehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers laſt year; otherwiſe it would hardly be found, that Jehojakim his ſucceſſor did reign ten whole years; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather caſt the three moneths of this ſhort reign, into the firſt year of the brother, than into the fathers laſt, the ſame arguments that ſhall maintain his opinion, will alſo prove the matter to be unworthy of diſputation; and ſo I leave it.

Jehojakim in impiety was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharao. The wickedneſs of theſe laſt Kings being expreſſed in Scriptures none otherwiſe, than by general words, with reference to all the evil that their Fathers had done, makes it apparent, that the poyſon wherewith Ahaz and Manaſſes had infected the Land, was not ſo expelled by the zealous goodneſs of Joſias, but that it ſtill cleaved unto the chief of the people, Yea, unto the Prieſts alſo; and therefore it was not ſtrange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royal authority was much abaſed by the dangers wherein the Countrey ſtood, in this troubleſome age: the Princes did in a manner what they liſted; neither would the Kings forbear to profeſs, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehojakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him inſolent and cruel;

as we find by that example of his dealing with Uria the Prophet: though herein alſo the Princes do appear to have been inſtigators. This holy man denounced Gods judgements againſt the City and Temple, in like ſort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the ſame age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poor man fled into Egypt: but ſuch regard was had unto Jehojakim, that Uria was delivered unto his Embaſſadour, and ſent back to the death; contrary to the cuſtom uſed, both in thoſe dayes, and ſince, among all civil Nations, of giving refuge unto ſtrangers, that are not held guilty of ſuch inhuman crimes, as for the general good of mankind ſhould be exempted from all priviledge.

It concerned Pharao to give all contentment poſſible to Jehojakim: for the Aſſyrian Lyon, that had not ſtirred in many years, began about theſe times to roar ſo loud upon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nilus, threatning to make himſelf Lord of all the Forreſt. The cauſes that hitherto had withdrawn the houſe of Merodach from oppoſing the Egyptian in his conqueſt of Syria, require our conſideration in this place, before we proceed to commit them together at Carchemiſh, where ſhortly after this the glory of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to paſs that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their buſineſs in Syria; which cauſed them to loſe that Province.

Merodach the ſon of Baladan, who taking the advantage that Sennacherib's miſadventure and death, together with the diſſention between his children, preſented, made himſelf King of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerful Enemy, Aſarhaddon the ſon of Sennacherib, reigning over the Aſſyrians in Nineve; from whom whileſt he could not any other way divert his cares, he was fain to omit all buſineſs in Syria, and (as hath been formerly ſhewed) to make over unto Ezechia ſome part of the Kingdom of the ten Tribes. From this moleſtation, the death of Aſarhaddon did not only ſet him free, but gave unto him ſome part of Aſſyria, if not (as is commonly, but leſs probably thought) the whole Kingdom. How greatly this was to the liking of the Aſſyrians, I will not here ſtand to enquire: his long reign following, and his little intermedling in matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or eſtabliſhing that which he had gotten. Joſephus gives him the honour of having won Nineve it ſelf, which we may believe; but ſurely he did not hold it long. For in the times ſoon following, that great City was free, and vanquiſhed Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded upon ſome capitulation: and refuſed afterwards to continue ſubject, when the Kings, being of the Chaldæan race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Aſſyrian King, whoſe Captains took Manaſſes priſoner, but I rather believe thoſe that hold the contrary, for which I have given my reaſons in due place. To ſay truth, I find little cauſe why Merodach ſhould have looked into thoſe parts, as long as the Jews were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themſelves quiet at home, which was until the time of Pſammiticus, about the end of this Kings Reign, or the beginning of his ſon.

Ben Merodach the ſon and ſucceſſour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good conſent of Authors, and that ſpeak little of his doings. The length of his Reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years; for ſo much remaineth of the time that paſſed between the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephews Reigns (which is a known ſum) deducting the years of his Father, and of his ſon Nabulaſſar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manaſſes Priſoner, and releaſed him. He ſped ill in Syria; where Pſammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercenary Grecks, did much prevail. This may have been ſome cauſe that he releaſed Manaſſes, and did put into his hands ſome part more of the Kingdom of Samaria: which is made probable by circumſtances alledged before.

Nabulaſſar that reigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater buſineſs in his own Kingdom, than would permit him to look abroad: inſomuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or over-ſight of Pſammiticus and Necho, that they did not occupy ſome good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Aſſyria, and beſieged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulaſſar, but conſtrained to remove by the coming of the Scythians, who in theſe ages did overflow thoſe parts of the world, laying hold upon all that they could maſter by ſtrong hand. Of theſe Scythians, and the Lordſhip that they held in Aſia, it is conve nient that I ſpeak in this place; ſhewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes; upon whom they firſt fell, were buſied in the ſame times with hopes of conquering Aſſyria.

Phraortes, the ſon of Deioces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a fair poſſibility of making himſelf Lord of Nineve.

Herod lib. 1 That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Soveraign Lady was not forſaken of all her dependants; yet remained in ſuch caſe, that of her ſelf ſhe was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howſoever Merodach had gotten poſſeſſion of this imperial ſeat, and made it ſubject as was the reſt of the Country, yet it found the means to ſet it ſelf at liberty: as after this again it did, when it had been regained by Nabulaſſar his Grand-child.

Sharp war, and the very novelty of ſudden violence, uſe to diſmay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but cuſtom of danger hardeneth even thoſe that are unwarlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had ſuffered, and reſiſted, all the fury, wherewith either Domeſtical tumults between the ſons of Sennacherib, or forreign war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the leſs wonderful, that Phraortes did ſpeed ſo ill in his journey againſt it. He and the moſt of his Army periſhed in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumſtances (perhaps they undervalued their forces, and brought a leſs power than was needful.) It is enough, that herein we may believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares the ſon of Phraortes, a braver man of War than his Father, wan as much of Aſia the leſs, as lay Eaſtward, from the River of Halys; he ſought revenge upon the Aſſyrians for the death of his father, and beſieged Nineve it ſelf, having a purpoſe to deſtroy it. I rather believe Euſebius, That he took the City, and fulfilled his diſpleaſure upon it, than Herodotus, That the Scythian Army came upon him whileſt he lay before it. For where equal authorities are contradictory (as Euſebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet having ſeen other Authors that are now loſt, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it beſt, to yield unto the beſt likelihoods.

To think that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whileſt he lay before Nineve, were to accuſe him of greater improvidence than ought to be ſuſpected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to ſuppoſe that he was fain to leave the Town, when a War ſo dangerous fell upon his own Country, doth well agree both with the condition of ſuch buſineſs as that Scythian expedition brought into thoſe parts, and with the State of the Chaldæan and Aſſyrian affairs enſuing.

The deſtruction of this great City is both foretold in the Book of Tobit, and there ſet down as happening about theſe times; of which Book whoſoever was the Author, he vvas ancient enough to know the ſtory of thoſe ages, and hath committed no ſuch error in reckoning of times, as ſhould cauſe us to diſtruſt him in this. As for the Prophecy of Nahum, though it be not limited unto any certain term, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the final deſtruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonoſor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a conqueſt of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, vvhereof vve vvill ſpeak in due place. Some that aſcribe more authority than the reformed Churches yield, to the book of Tobit, are careful, as in a matter of neceſſity, to affirm, that about theſe times, Nineve was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it to Ben Merodach: a needleſs conjecture, if the place of Euſebius be vvell conſidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulaſſar the ſon of Ben Merodach did ſeize upon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about ſuch time as the Country of Aſſyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian War overwhelmed Media. For then was the Conqueſt wrought out ready to his hand; the ſwelling ſpirits of the Ninevites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon ſo much aſſwaged, that it might be thought a great favour, if Nabulaſſar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, took him and them in protection: though afterwards to their confuſion, this unthankful People and their King rebelled again, as ſhall be ſhewed in the Reign of Nabuchodonoſor.

§. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Aſia eight and twenty years.

‖. 1.

The time of his expedition.

NOw that I have ſhewed what impediment was given by the Aſſyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much diſabled to perform any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I ſpeak of that great Scythian expedition, pedition, which grievouſly afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in ſuch wiſe, that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themſelves. Of the Scythian people in general, Herodotus makes very large diſcourſe, but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many Fables; of this expedition he tells many particulars, but ill agreeing with conſent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needleſs to recite them; for they are far enough diſtant from the buſineſs in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may ſeem very ſtrange, needeth ſome anſwer in this place: leſt otherwiſe I ſhould either ſeem to make my ſelf too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale; or elſe to be too forgetful of my ſelf, in bringing to act upon the Stage, thoſe perſons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years, he ſaith, that the Scythians reigned in Aſia, before Cyaxares delivered the Country from them. Yet he reports a War between Cyaxares and Haliattes the Lydian, as foregoing the ſiege of Nineve; the ſiege of Nineve being ere the Scythians came. And further he tells, how the Scythians, having vanquiſhed the Medes, did paſs into Syria, and were encountred in Paleſtina by Pſammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. Theſe narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in ſuch order of time, as he hath marſhalled them. For Pſammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reign: and Cyaxares had ſpent half of his forty years, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia, ſo that he could not, after thoſe Lydian Wars, reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians. It is true, that Euſebius doth alſo call Pſammis the ſon of Pharao Neco, by the name of Pſammiticus; and this King Pſammis may, by ſome ſtrained conjecture, be thought to have been he that met with the Scythians: for he lived with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Euſebius himſelf refers all that buſineſs of the Scythian irruption into Palæſtina to Pſammiticus the Father of Necho, whom he leaves dead before the Reign of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not rely upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwiſe than to believe him, that ſuch things were in theſe ages, though not in ſuch order as he ſets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, thoſe memorials which I find of this expedition ſcattered in divers places: a work neceſſary, for that the greatneſs of this action was ſuch, as ought not to be omitted in general Hiſtory; yet not eaſie, the conſent of thoſe that have written thereof, being nothing near to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the reign of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians overran that Kingdom, and were not expelled, until Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the upper hand of them. In theſe times therefore of Ardys, Sardiattes, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Aſia. Now foraſmuch as Pſammiticus the Egyptian had ſome dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their proſperity, we muſt needs allow more than one or two of his laſt years unto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reign in Lydia, being three and twenty years compleat after the death of Pſammiticus, leaves the ſpace very ſcant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, neceſſarily ſuppoſed before they could meet the Egyptian in Syria, or for thoſe many loſſes, which they muſt have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increaſe this difficulty, the victorious Reign of Nabuchodonoſor in Babylon, is of no ſmall moment. For how may we think it poſſible, that he ſhould have adventured the ſtrength of the Kingdom againſt the Egyptians and Jews, had he ſtood in daily fear of loſing his own, to a more mighty Nation, that lay upon his neck? To ſpeak ſimply as it appears to me, the victories aſcribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes over theſe warlike people, were not obtained againſt the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of ſome troops that infeſted their ſeveral Kingdoms; other Princes, and among theſe Nabulaſſar having the like ſucceſs, when the pleaſures of Aſia had mollified the courages of theſe hardy Northern Lads. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almoſt the laſt of Nabulaſſar's Reign, in compaſs whereof their power was at the greateſt. This is all that I can ſay of the time, wherein Aſia ſuffered the violence of their oppreſſors.

§. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Aſia; with the cauſe of their Journey.

TOuching the expedition it ſelf, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and waſted ſome part of Aſia; and that the Scythians, not contented with having won the land of the Cimmerians, did did follow them, I know not why, into far removed quarters of the World, so (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischievous and fooliſh; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Country-men, great ſlanderers of those, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievously ranſackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their many Conqueſts so well teſtified in Hiſtories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greeks is inſufficient to ſtain them with the note of Cowards. Theſe were the poſterity of Gomer, who peopled the greateſt part of our Weſtern World; and whoſe re-flow did overwhelm no ſmall portion of Greece and Aſia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely inform himſelf of their original and actions, may peruſe Goropius Becanus his Amazonica, of many things in which Book, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is ſaid to have ſpoken of all Goropius his works, that it is eaſie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we find it proved, by ſuch arguments and authorites as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howſoever diſtinguiſhed in name, by reaſon of their divers tribes, profeſſions, or perhaps dialect of ſpeech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whoſe Country whether he placeth in the Weſt, as near unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being far from the Sun, and covered with eternal darkneſs; certain it is that he would have them near neighbours to Hell: for he had the ſame quarrel to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them ſeem a kind of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to inſert into his Works the names of ſuch as lived in his own time, making ſuch mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himſelf deſerved. And for this reaſon it is proved by Euſtathius, that the Cimmerians were ſo diſgraced by him, becauſe they had waſted his Country. Perhaps that invaſion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his diſcourſe with Helen, was the very ſame, which Euſebius noteth to have happened ſomewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Aſia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Aſia; which though it be not in expreſs terms written, that they did with joynt-forces, yet ſeeing they invaded the ſelf-ſame places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned alſo by Euſebius, was by the ſtreights of the Cimmerians, as we find in Diodore, who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them aſſiſtance. Diod. lib. 4. c. 2.

The ſame Author, before his entry into thoſe diſcourſes of the Amazons, which himſelf acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been Wives of the Scythians, and no leſs War-like than their Huſbands; alledging the example of that Queen who is ſaid to have ſlain the great Perſian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their Wives along with them to the wars; and how deſperate the courage was of thoſe Women; the terrible deſcent of them into Italy, when Marius the Roman overthrew them, gives proof ſufficient. I will not here enter into a diſcourſe of the Amazons; another place will give me better leiſure to ſpeak of them: but ſeeing that they are noted by divers Hiſtorians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Goropius his concluſion, That theſe three Nations were one, at leaſt that they were near alies. Diod. lib. 2. c. 11.

Now as concerning the expulſion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the ſending of a Colony of them forth into Aſia, with an Army of Scythians to help them, in purchaſing a new ſeat, and eſtabliſhing the Plantation.

The Sarmatians alſo were companions in this journey. For the City of Novograd in Ruſſia (which Country is the ſame that was called Sarmatia) ſtood in their way homewards, as ſhall anon be further ſhewed. So that all the North was up in Arms: and therefore it is no marvel though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the ſame people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they iſſued from the parts about the Lake Mæotis; they were then likewiſe aſſiſted (ſaith Plutarch in the moſt likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Army above three hundred thouſand fighting men, beſides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandred over many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, Plutarch in the life of Marius.

finally, thinking to have ſetled themſelves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more eaſie paſſage thither, and were conſumed in three terrible battels by the Roman Conſuls. Meer neceſſity enforced theſe poor Nations to trouble the World, in following ſuch hard adventures. For their Country being more fruitful of men than of ſuſtenance, and ſhut up on the North ſide with intollerable cold, which denied iſſue that way to their over-ſwelling multitudes; they were compelled to diſcharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of poſſeſſion, as having title to all that they had power to get, becauſe they wanted all, that weaker, but more civil, people had. Their ſturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardneſs, gave them great advantage over ſuch as were accuſtomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thouſand ſuperfluities. Wherefore moſt commonly they prevailed very far; their next neighbours giving them free paſſage, that they might the ſooner be rid of them; others giving them, beſides paſſage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great preſents; ſo as the farther they went on, the more pleaſant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

§. III.

Of the Cimmerians War in Lydia.

THe firſt Company of theſe, conſiſting for the moſt part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had ſtill on the right hand; leaving on the other ſide, and behind them, the great Mountains of Caucaſus. Theſe having paſſed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entred the Country of Pontus, and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promonto-
Herod. l. 4. ry, whereon Synope, a famous Haven Town of the Greeks, was after built. Here it ſeems that they beſtowed the weakeſt and moſt unſerviceable of their train, together with the heavieſt part of their carriages, under ſome good guard: as drawing near to thoſe Regions, in conqueſt whereof they were to try the utmoſt hazzard. For in like ſort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I ſpake even now) diſpoſe of their impediments, leaving them in a place of ſtrength, where Antwerp now ſtands, when they drew near unto Gaul, upon which they determined to adventure themſelves in the purchaſer. From Sinop, the way unto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was fair and open to the Cimmerians, without any ladg of Mountains, or any deep Rivers at all to ſtay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already paſſed.

What battels were fought between theſe Invaders and the Lydians, and with what variable ſucceſs the one or other part wan and loſt, I find not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got poſſeſſion of Sardes the capital City of Lydia; only the Caſtle holding out againſt them. Further I obſerve, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this invaſion, and by Halyattes and Cræſus in the times following, all that Ardys did againſt the Cimmerians, and all, ſave burning the Mileſians Corn fields, that was done in twelve years by Sadyattes his ſon (who perhaps had his hands ſo full of this buſineſs, that he could turn them to nothing elſe) is quite omitted: whereby it may ſeem, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in thoſe Wars, but were glad enough that they did loſe all.

Certainly the miſeries of War are never ſo bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forſaking their own ſeats, labour to root out the eſtabliſhed poſſeſſors of another Land; making room for themſelves, their wives and children. They that fight for the maſtery, are pacified with tribute, or with ſome other ſervices and acknowledgements; which had they been yielded at the firſt, all had been quiet, and no ſword bloudied. But in theſe migrations, [illegible] and ſailants bring ſo little with them, that they [illegible]ed all which the defendants have; their Lands and Cattel, their houſes and their goods, even to the cradles of the ſucking Infants. The mercileſs terms of this controverſie, arm both ſides with deſperate reſolution: ſeeing the one part muſt either win, or periſh by famine; the other defend their goods, or loſe their lives without redemption. Moſt of the Countries in Europe have felt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrown by ſuch invaſions. But our Iſle of Britain can beſt witneſs the diverſity of Conqueſts; having by the happy victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civil Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but ſlenderly inſtructed therein before; whereas the iſſue of the Saxon and Daniſh Wars, was, as were the cauſes, quite contrary. For theſe did not ſeek after the Dominion onely, but the entire poſſeſſion of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the Britiſh Race, and defacing all memorial of the ancient inhabitants through the the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are alſo of the Cimmerian bloud) found ſuch end of their enterprize, as it may ſeem that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Aſia, did arrive unto. So that by conſidering the proceſs of the one, we ſhall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battels the Danes won, yet none of ſuch importance, as ſufficed to make them abſolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not ſo great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firm footing. But in courſe of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred ſuch acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both theſe people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their diſagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced in one mild temper, no ſmall number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great ſlaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their own Country wide enough to receive them, as having diſburthened it ſelf of many thouſands, that were ſent to ſeek their graves abroad. And ſuch (as I think) was the end of the Cimmerian War in Lydia; whereunto though ſome victory of Halyattes may have haſtened the concluſion, yet the weariſome length of time ſeems to have done moſt, in compelling them to deſire of reſt. I know not why I ſhould fear to add hereunto my further conjecture, which is, that the matter was ſo compounded between the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the River Halys ſhould divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eaſtern ſide of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians, and other Scythian people; whoſe wives and daughters theſe warlike women are ſuppoſed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrel enſuing between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is ſaid) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median ſought revenge. And it ſtands with reaſon, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutual ſlaughters, ſhould have joyned in a league of mutual defence for their common ſafety: though otherwiſe it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdom ſo far Weſtward, whatſoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon ſuch as had ſpoiled each of their Countries. As for that occaſion of the War between theſe two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little weight, and leſs probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chaſed out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyaxares, who committed unto them certain Boys, to be inſtructed in the Scythian tongue, and feat of Archery. Now it ſo fell out (ſaith he) that theſe Scythians uſing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home ſomewhat with them, did nevertheleſs other-whiles miſs of their game, and came home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholerick, bitterly reviled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boys that was under their charge, whom, dreſſing like Veniſon, they preſented unto him; which done, they fled unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a War that laſted ſix years between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding theſe Fugitives to be delivered into his hand, the other refuſing to betray ſuch men as were become his ſuppliants. To this I will ſay no more, than that I ſee no cauſe that might induce the Scythians to betake themſelves to either of theſe Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought ſo much diſpleaſure. Particularly, they had reaſon to diſtruſt Cyaxares, for the treachery that he ſhewed in the maſſacring of their Country-men that were in his Kingdom, of whom it is now meet that we ſhould ſpeak. Herod lib. 1.

§. IV.

The War of the Scythians in the higher Aſia.

AS the Cimmerians held their courſe Weſterly, along the ſhores of the Euxine ſea, ſo the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caſpian ſea on their left hand, paſſed between it and Caucaſus, through Albania, Colthene, and other obſcure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, and ſo they entred into Media. The Medes encountred them in Arms, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whileſt Pſammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the ſixt year of Nabulaſſar's Reign over Babylon (ſuppoſing him to have reigned five and thirty; otherwiſe we muſt allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then do the eight and twenty years of their Dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonoſor was King; ſo giving him good leave to provide ſecurely for the invaſion of Syria; which which expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as Joſephus out of Beroſus relates the Hiſtory.

Now the Medes, deſirous to ſave themſelves as vvell as they might, from this terrible nation, vvhich vvhen they had no luſt to a ſecond trial of the ſword, refuſed not to undergo the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing diſhonourable, that would ſerve to remove theſe troubleſome gueſts into ſome other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding ſtill the Countries pleaſanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did ſuffer themſelves to be perſwaded, that a little more travail would add a great deal more to their content. For they relyed ſo much upon their own valour, that they feared no reſiſtance, and being the braveſt men, they thought it reaſon that they ſhould dwell in the beſt Region. That Phraortes perſwaded them into Egypt, I do not think; Babylon was near enough; whither if he could ſend theſe Locuſts to graze, then ſhould not his unfriendly Neighbours have cauſe to laugh at his misfortune. What ſhift Nabulaſſar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not read. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the middeſt between Media and Egypt; as alſo, that they made all thoſe parts of Aſia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watered their horſes in his Rivers, and that he alſo was content to give them provender.

Pſammiticus hearing of their progreſs (like the jealous Husband of a fair Wife) took care that they might not look upon Egypt, leſt the ſight thereof ſhould more eaſily detain them there, than any force or perſwaſion that he could uſe would ſend them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, preſuming more on the great gifts which he meant to beſtow upon them, than on his Army that ſhould keep them back. Egypt was rich; and half the riches had not been ill ſpent in ſaving all. Yet Pſammiticus took the moſt likely courſe, whereby to make his part good againſt them by ſtrong hand, in caſe they had been ſo obſtinate as to refuſe all indifferent compoſition. For he lay cloſe upon the edge of the Wilderneſs in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermoſt border of Palæſtina: whence he never advanced to meet with the Scythians, but gave them leave to feel as much of the ſcalding Sun-beams, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beat upon them. When they were come as far as Aſcalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he allay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work ſo much the better, by how much the worſe they were pleaſed with the heat of a Climate ſo far different from their own. Pſammiticus had at his back a vaſt wilderneſs, over the ſcorching ſands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary diſtempers, could ill have endured to purſue him through unknown ways, had they fought with him and prevailed, eſpecially the Kingdom of Egypt being ready to entertain him vvith relief, and them vvith nevv trouble at the end of their vveary journey. Wherefore they vvere content to be intreated, & taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to viſit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (beſides that hee preſerved his own Eſtate from a dangerous adventure, by hyring this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coaſt vvell repayed in the proceſs of his vvars in Syria, vvhere the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to moleſt him, being more than ever troubled themſelves with the return of their oppreſſors. For the Scythians, reſolving novv to ſeek no further, began to demand more than the tribute formerly impoſed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals vvith grievous exactions, they preſumed to live at diſcretion upon the Country, taking vvhat they liſted from the owners; and many times (as it vvere to ſave the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This tyrannous Dominion they long uſed over the higher Aſia, that is, over the Country lying between the Caſpian and Red Seas: and between India and Aſia the leſs. Happy it was for the poor people, that in ſo large a ſpace of ground, there was room enough for theſe new comers otherwiſe the calamity that fell, as it vvere by chance, upon thoſe private men, to whoſe wealth any Scythian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in general upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellowes. Yet it ſeems that the heavieſt burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrey, not far from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the conſtitution of their bodies there alſo it vvas that they had the fatal blow, by vvhich their inſolent Rule vvas taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, vvho in this extremity vvas no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waſte, through the negligence of his people, that vvere out of heart by daily oppreſſions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force reſolved to prove what might be done by Herod. lib. 1.

ſtratagem. The managing of the buſineſs is thus delivered in brief; That he, and his Medes, feaſted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunk, and ſlew them; recovering hereby the poſſeſſion of all that they had loſt.

Such another ſlaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their Countrymen, with greater cruelty than ever they had practiſed before. That the Scythians which eſcaped this bloody feaſt made any ſtir in Media, I do not find; neither do I read that either in revenge hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by invaſion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more ſtrange, for that the Army returning home out of Media, was very ſtrong, & encountred with oppoſition (as Herodotus reports it) no leſs than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Countrey, took good effect, with leſs blood-ſhed than hath been ſuppoſed. For if he ſurpriſed all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compoſition. Many of them doubtleſs in eight and twenty years had ſo well ſetled themſelves, that they were deſirous of reſt, & might be permitted, without any danger, to remain in the Country; many (of whom I ſhall ſpeak anon) having done what they could in the buſineſs, for which they came forth, were willing to return home with what they had gotten; ſuch as were not pleaſed with either of theſe two courſes, might go joyn with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or ſeek their fortunes in other Provinces among their own Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are ſaid to have been with Nebuchadnezzar, it may be underſtood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gain, or deſire to keep what they had already gained, were content to become ſubject unto Nabulaſſar; mens love of their wealth being moſt effectual, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certain, that Nebuchadnezzer, as ever after, ſo in his firſt beginning of war, did beat the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had been accuſtomed to deal with the Babylonians after another faſhion: and this new ſucceſs of that King may be imputed, in regard of human means, to ſuch addition as this of new forces.

Jer. 35. 9.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers authors report a Story, which confirms me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to aſſiſt their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new ſeat, and eſtabliſhing their plantation. For theſe had left their wives behind them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Scythian women, to comfort themſelves in their husbands abſence, became bed-fellows to their ſlaves. Theſe got a luſty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were onely the children of ſlaves, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tels us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it muſt needs be that they were very boys, or elſe that the Women did very little while continue chaſt. Wherefore I rather believe that tale as it is told by the Ruſſes themſelves, who agreeing in the reſt with the conſent of Hiſtories, make that report of their Anceſtors returning homewards, which I will ſet down, as I find it in Maſter Doctor Fletcher his exact diſcourſe of the Ruſs Commonwealth. They underſtood by the way, that their Chrolopey, or Bond-ſlaves, whom they left at home, had in their abſence poſſeſſed their towns, lands, houſes, wives, and all; At which news being ſomewhat amazed, and yet diſdaining the Villany of their ſervants, they made the more ſpeed home, and ſo not far from Novograd met them in warlike manner marching againſt them. Whereupon adviſing what was beſt to be done, they agreed alſo to ſet upon them with no other ſhew of weapon but with their horſe-whips (which as their manner is, every man rideth withal) to put them in remembrance of their ſervile condition, thereby to terrifie them, & abate their courage. And ſo marching on, and laſhing all together with their whips in their hands, they gave the onſet; which ſeemed ſo terrible in the ears of their Villains, and ſtrook ſuch a ſenſe into them of the ſmart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheep before the Drivers, In memory of this victory, the Novogradians ever ſince have ſtamped their Coin (which they call a Dingoe Novogradskoy, currant through all Ruſſia) with the figure of a Horſeman ſhaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may ſeem, that all the women of that Country have fared the worſe ever ſince, in regard of the univerſal fault: For ſuch a Pudkey or whip, as terrified thoſe ſlaves, curiouſly wrought by her ſelf, is the firſt preſent that the Muſcovian wife, even in time of wooing, ſends to him that ſhall be her husband, in token of ſubjection, being well aſſured to feel it often on her own loins. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Samarians (for Novograd ſtands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of abſenting themſelves any more ſo long from their wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Ruſ. Commonw. cap. 4.

Thus

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, & terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cause of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judæa, which continues yet a while the center of our discourse.

§. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries, in these ages.

HAving thus far digressed from the matters of Juda, to avoyd all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings, and men of mark, as were between the death of Manasses, and the ruin of Jerusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much as I thought needful. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdom until the one and twentieth year of Josias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a newcome stranger, but very rich, prevailed so far by his graciousness among the people, that he got the Kingdom to himself, disappointing the sons of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely, in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedæmonians bethinking them how to be avenged of the Arcadians, who gave succour to the Messenians against them in the former war, entred their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soon after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidæ, made himself Lord of Corinth about these times, and governed it in peace thirty years; leaving for successour his son Periander, one of the seven Sages, but a cruel Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his own wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparel, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive, that the wisdom of the Grecks was not excellent in those days, when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus and Draco, famous lawgivers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Laws of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, and power given to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Laws of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbad any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unless it were when she was drunk; or to go forth of the Town by night, unless it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dress her self up in immodest bravery, unless it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleasant ordinances he effected his desire: for none would seem, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of justice, that when his own son had committed adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gave one eye of his own to save the young man (who also lost one) from utter blindness.

I shall not therefore need so far to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldæans will soon fall under the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred years, which passed between the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, we find little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neerest borderers. Yet read we of many Kingdoms, that in these many ages were erected and thrown down; as likewise many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any near distance; all which must have been quite omitted, or else reserved unto a very unseasonable rehearsal, had they not been disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the necessity.

The oppression of Judæa, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldæans.

NOw to return to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so far digressed. In the third year of Jehojakim, Nabuchodonosor the ſecond, his Father yet living, entred Judæa with a great Army, who beſieging and forcing Jeruſalem, made Jehojakim his vaſſal in deſpight of Necho, that had eſtabliſhed him King, and took with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a child, with Ananias, Miſael, and Azarias. Alſo he took a part of the Church treaſures; but ſtayed not to ſearch them throughly; for Necho haſted to the ſuccour of Jehojakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonoſor in Judæa: wherein this great Babylonian had no diſpoſition to hazard himſelf and his Army, it being a Country of an evil affection towards him, as alſo far off from any ſuccour or ſure place of retrait. If he had, as may be ſuppoſed, any great ſtrength of Scythian horſe-men in his Army, it was the more wiſely done of him, to fall back, out of the rough, mountainous, and over-hot Country, into places that were more even and temperate. But beſides all theſe reaſons, the death of his father happening at the ſame time, gave him juſt occaſion to return home, and take poſſeſſion of his own Kingdom, before he proceeded further in the ſecond care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reaſonable good leiſure; for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him ſo far, and to bid him battel, until the new year came in; which was the fourth of Jehojakim, the firſt of Nabuchodonoſor, and the laſt of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the Bank Euphrates (his own territory bounding it on the North-ſide) attended the arrival of Necho. There, after a reſolved contention for victory, Necho was ſlain, and his Army remaining forced to ſave it ſelf; which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victory Nabuchodonoſor ſo well purſued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatſoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the preſent diſcouraged, Jehojakim held himſelf quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptians, yet having made his peace with the Chaldæan the year before; who contented with ſuch profit as he could then readily make, had forborn to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this cool reſervedneſs of Jehojakim, was, on both ſides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Pſammis, who ſucceeded unto Necho, began to think upon reſtoring Jehoahaz, taken priſoner by his Father, and ſetting him up as a Domeſtical Enemy, againſt his ungrateful brother. Againſt all ſuch accidents, the Judæan had prepared the uſual remedy practiſed by his forefathers: for he had made his own ſon Jechonia King with him long before, in the ſecond year of his own Reign, when the Boy was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoahaz his return, the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it ſhould prove idle, ſaying: He ſhall not return thither, but he ſhall die in the place whither they had led him captive, and ſhall ſee this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having ſpent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavy blow at Carchemiſh, had not remaining ſuch proportion of ſharp ſteel, as of fair gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Pſammis Apres, who reigning after Pſammis, did once adventure to ſhew his face in Syria; but after a big look, he was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battel. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with brave words, telling ſuch frivolous tales, as men that mean to do nothing, uſe, of their glorious acts fore-paſſed, againſt Joſias and Jehoahaz. In this caſe it was eaſie for Jehojakim to give them ſatisfaction, by letting them underſtand the ſincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonoſor went to work more roundly. He ſent a peremptory meſſage to Jehojakim, willing him not to ſtand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himſelf a Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto ſuch fearful threats, as made the poor Judæan lay aſide all thoughts of Pharaoh, and yield to do, as the more mighty would have him. So he continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonoſor three years. At this time Jeremy the Prophet cried out againſt the Jews, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to repentance, but becauſe they had ſtopt their ears againſt him, and the reſt of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that they ſhould endure the yoke of bondage full ſeventy years. The ſame calamity he threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumæans, and the reſt; foretelling that they ſhould all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forſaken; and after the ſeventy years expired, that the Babylonians themſelves ſhould taſte of the ſame Cup, and be utterly ſubverted by the Medes, and the Judæans permitted to return again into their own Fields and Cities. The firſt impriſonment of the Prophet Jeremy ſeems to have been in the fourth year of this Jehojakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrought all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he ſent to read them unto the People, and afterwards to the Princes, who offered them to the the King: but fearing the Kings fury, they had firſt ſet Jeremy at liberty, and adviſed him and Baruch to hide themſelves.

Jehojakim, after he heard a part of it, and perceived the ill newes therein delivered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Book in peices and caſt it into the fire. All which Jeremy cauſed to be new written with this addition; that the dead body of Jehojakim ſhould be caſt out, expoſed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the froſt, and there ſhould be none of his ſeed to ſit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehojakim reſted ſecure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty City of Tyre oppoſed it ſelf againſt the Chaldæan forces, and upon juſt confidence of her own ſtrength, deſpiſed all preparation that could be made againſt her. Now foraſmuch as the terme of ſeventy years was preſcribed unto the deſolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jeruſalem, and other towns and countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonoſor, have ſure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewiſe it followes of neceſſity, that the ſiege thereof began in the ſeventh of his Reign, as having laſted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief note, concerning the ſeveral beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath riſen much diſputation. The third year of Jehojakim, was the laſt of Nabnlaſſar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of ſuch as had revolted from him unto Pharao Necho, and ſent this Noble Prince his ſon, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the ſame year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehojakim, was the firſt of Nebuchadnezzar; which Jeremy affirmeth in expreſſe words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Egypt; & then began ro reign as a great Monarch, finding none that durſt offend him. The ſecond from this year it was, wherein he ſaw that viſion, of the Image conſiſting of ſundry Metals; which did prefigurate the ſucceſſion of great Kingdomes, that ſhould rule the Earth, before the comming of Chriſt. I will not ſtand to diſpute about this, which is the beſt concluſion that I find, of long diſputations: but return unto the ſiege of Tyre, which began in the ſeventh of his Reign.

Dan. 1. 1. Jer. 25. 1.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Iſland, that was divided from the main, by a deep and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldæans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to uſe them, excelled all other Nations; and every wind, from one part or other, brought needfull proviſions into the City. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof nevertheleſſe the judgments of God (denounced againſt it by Eſay, Jeremy, Ezechiel) had threatned the deſtruction; & the obſtinate reſolution of Nabuchodonoſor had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of reſiſtance, undertook a vaſt peice of work, even to fill up the Sea that parted the Iſland from the Continent. The City of old Tyrus, that ſtood oppoſite to the new, upon the firm Land, and the mountain of Lybanus neer adjoyning that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furniſh him with materials. Thirteen years were ſpent in this laborious, and almoſt hopeleſſe buſineſſe. Which needeth not ſeem ſtrange: for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonoſor's Peere, and being withall aſſiſted by a ſtrong Fleet, was yet ſeven moneths ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to cover a ſhelve; with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were conſume, the work of Nabuchodonoſor, who laid his foundations in the bottom of the deep; ſtriving as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, whereas the Macedonian did only ſtop the throat of it. Every man knows, God could have furthered the accompliſhment of his own threats, againſt this place (though it had not pleaſed him to uſe, either Miracle, or ſuch of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at leaſt the Seas calm, and adding the favorable concurrance of all ſecond helps. But ſo it pleaſeth him oftentimes, in chaſtiſing the pride of man, to uſe the hand of man; even the hand of man ſtriving, as may ſeem, againſt all reſiſtance of nature and fortune. So in this exceſſive labour of the Chaldæans, Every head was made bald, and every ſhoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonoſor would not give over till he was maſter of the Town.

When he was entred upon this deſperate ſervice; whether it were ſo, that ſome loſſes received, ſome mutiny in his Army, or (which is moſt likely, and ſo Joſephus reports it) ſome glorious rumour of the Egyptians, gave courage courage to his evill willers; Jehojakim renounced his subjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gave him no leisure to doe much hurt: but with part of his Army marched directly into Judea, where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were, in a dream) that he entred Jerusalem, and layed hands on Jehojakim, whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, he caused him to be slain in the place, and gave him the sepulchre of an Asse, to be devoured by beasts and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place Jehojakim or Jechonias his son; whom, after three moneths and ten dayes Nabuchodonosor removed, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochæus and Josedech, the high Priest. The mother of Jechonias, together with his servants Eunuches, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the land, were also then carried away Captives. This Jechonias, following the counsell of Jeremy the Prophet, made no resistance; but submitted himself to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himself; though at the present it might seem otherwise, to such as considered the evill that befell him, rather than the greater evill that he thereby avoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded, which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator, which was the cause, that his submitting himself to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we read in generall words, that he did evill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Uncle in the Kingdom of Iuda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the justice of God. For like as Neco King of Egypt had formerly displaced Iehoahaz, after his Father Josias was slain, and set up Jehojakim, the son of another mother, so Nabuchodonosor slew Jehojakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his son Jechonias Prisoner to Babel, gave the Kingdom to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Jehoahaz, whom Neco took with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the living God to witnesse in the same, that he would remain assured to the Kings of Chaldæa.

In the first year of Zedechias, Jeremy saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judæans that were carried away captive, the other those that stayed and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremy wrote in a book all the evill that should fall upon Babylon, which book or scrole he gave to Sheraiah, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to read it to the Captive Jewes; and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Bable be drowned, and shall not rise from the evill that I will bring upon her. This journey of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have been in a way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further think, that he had some sute there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his return all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seems) to those unquiet courses, from which Jeremy dehorted both him and them. The prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent unto the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enjoy their own countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire and pestilence.

He also foretold them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Jerusalem, should also travell after the rest, and at length they should be restored again.

The same year Ananias, the false Prophet, took off the woodden Chain which Jeremy wore in sign of the Captivity of the Jews, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two years God would break the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he laid on all Nations; restore Jechonias and all the Jewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Jeremy, instead of his woodden yoke, wore a Coller of yron: and in sign that Ananias had given a deceitfull and false hope to the people, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized upon him in the second Moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth year of his reign, he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promised great aydes of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and besieged it. Jeremy perswaded Zedechias to render the City and himself: but being confident of the help from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the kingdome of Juda should be extirpate, untill the comming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Jacob) he despised the words of Jeremy, and imprisoned him. For Jeremy had told the King that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Jer. 32. & 34.

Jerusalem being the following year surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Jeremy, (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entred the border of Juda with his Army to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he had been the principall Author. But Jeremy gave the Jewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to have any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them that they should return again, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldæans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough, leaving the poor people of Jerusalem to their destined miseries.

Jer. 44.
Herod. lib 2.

In the mean while the Jewes, who in their first extremity had manumised their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods law required at the year of Jubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldæan Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Jeremy, when the state of Jerusalem began now to grow to extremity, counselled Zedechias to render himself unto them; assuring him of his own life, and the safety of the City, if he would so do. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and perjurie, had provided for him.

Levit. 25. 39, 40. &c.
Jer. 39.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some do reckon it) or, according to Josephus, eighteen, the Babylonian Army laid before Jerusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum: They surrounded the City with woodden Towers, so as the besieged could neither sally out, nor receive into the City any supply of men or victuals. Josephus reports, that they overtopped the Walls with high Towers raised upon Mounts; from which they did so beat upon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like unto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions there-abouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens endeavours; and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his own works being guarded by the Walls of Jerusalem interposed; and theirs within, laid open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men straightly besieged) grew on fast upon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Jews failed, the Chaldæans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Town, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this uncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hopes at once; and shifted himself, together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principal servants, out of the City, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed and guideless people to the mercileſs swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet perswaded him to render himself, despised both the counsel of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor, used now that remedy, which Wolphius truly termeth, Triste, turpe, & infœliz: Woful, shameful, and unfortunate.

Jer. 39.
Jos. Ant. Jud. lib 10 c. 11.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the help of the dark night) the Plains or Desarts of Jericho: but by reason of the train that followed him and his (every one leading with him those whom they held most dear unto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attended on him, yet, as Josephus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most reposed himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldæans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Desarts, as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children and Princes, he was conveyed to Rebla or Reblath, a City (as some think) of Nephtalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jerusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to do.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had laid before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falshood and perjury, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes and Friends to be slain before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last that ever he should behold in the world, he caused his eyes to be torn out of his head, and so carried him in a slavish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetual imprisonment. Herein this most marvellous Prophecy of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babyloniam, & ipsam non videbit: I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it. Ezek. 12.

Thus in the eleventh and last year of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldæans entred the City by force, where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

3534 In the next year following, Nabuzaradan General of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Jerusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seventh to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood four hundred thirty and one years.

After this, upon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with blood) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chief, and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of War, five of his House-hold servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judæa; and leaving the poorest labouring souls, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: over whom he left Governour, Godoliah the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Josias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equity, by Josephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the War: and by Jeremies desire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same advice which the Prophet gave unto Zedechias; which was, to submit himself altogether to the Babylonian; who being ordained by God to exercise his justice, was therefore resistless. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldæa, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jewes that were left under his charge, promising them favour and liberty, so long as they remained obedient subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Provincial Governour of his own Nation. 2 Kin. ult.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Jerusalem, had kept himself out of the storm, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godoliah feasted them in Maspha or Mitspa, the City of his residence, traiterously slew him, together with divers Chaldæans and Jews that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eighty persons, repairing towards Godoliah with presents, he slew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover unto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had been formerly discovered unto Godoliah by Johanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jews; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Judæa being now left without a Governour (for Ismael durst not take it upon him, but retired himself, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jews, fearing the revenge of the Chaldæans, resolved to fly away into Egypt, and besought Jeremy to ask counsel of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Judæa, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this advice, the Jews held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, neer unto Taphnes: where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians, also, he was by these his own hard-hearted and ungrateful Countrymen, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reverenced him, buried neer the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time paſſing between the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the fall of the Aſſyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of the Connexion of Sacred and Prophane Hiſtory.

THE courſe of time, which in prophane Hiſtories might rather be diſcerned through the greateſt part of its way hitherto paſſed, in ſome out-worn foot-ſteps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eaſtern Countries by the accompt from Nabonaſſar, left ſurer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the War of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Jeruſalem, to diſcover the connexion of antiquity fore-ſpent, with the ſtory of ſucceeding Ages. Manifeſt it is, that the original and progreſs of things could ill be ſought in thoſe that were ignorant of the firſt Creation: as likewiſe that the affairs of Kingdoms and Empires afterwards grown up, are not to be found among thoſe that have now no ſtate nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore purſued the hiſtory of the World unto that age, from whence the memory of ſucceeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous diſcourſe derived unto us. I hold it now convenient, briefly to ſhew, by what means and circumſtances the Hiſtory of the Hebrews, which of all other is the moſt ancient, may be conjoyned with the following times, wherein that Image of ſundry metals diſcovered by God unto Nebuchadnezzar, did reign over the earth, when Iſrael was either none, or an unregarded Nation.

Herein I do not hold it needfull to insist upon those authorities which give, as it were by hear-say, a certain year of some old Assyrian King unto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his Issue that occupied the Kingdom afterwards, depending upon the uncertain relations of such as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye upon. Let it therefore suffice that the consent and harmony which some have found in the years of those over-worn Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true, that we find the names of all, or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we only learn in what Age each of them lived, but not in what year his reign began or ended, were it not that the reign of Nebuchadnezzar is more precisely applyed to the times of Jehojakim and Zedekias. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For under Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the Captivity of Judah, which ended when seventy years were expired; and these seventy years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well known, affords us means of looking back into the Ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his reign in Persia, by general consent, is joyned with the first year of the 55 Olympiad; where, that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversie. Giving therefore four hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiad by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the World, St. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the battell of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian Captivity, are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest years of the World through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some pains to inform our selves truly of the Seventy years during which it continued, even from Nebuchadnezzar unto Cyrus.

§. II.

A brief rehearsal of two Opinions touching the beginning of the Captivity: with an answer to the cavils of Porphyrie, inveighing against St. Matthew and Daniel, upon whom the latter of these Opinions is founded.

MAny Commentators, and other Historians and Chronologers find, that the Captivity then began, when Jechonia was carried prisoner into Babylon; eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedekias. This they prove out of divers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuzaradan, in these words; In the five and twentieth year of our being in Captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the City was smitten. In which words he beginneth the Captivity in plain terms, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion, that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Joakim; which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of Saint Matthew, and the whole Book of Daniel have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who not understanding how the Sons of King Josias were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large; thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what, in reckoning the Sons, or, according to some Translations, the Son, and Nephews of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious Books written against the Christians, affirming, that these propheſies and visions, remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or near the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond suppoſition of his,

Ezek. c. 1. v. 2. c. 3. v. 11. & 5.

Eusebius,

Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For, the Seventy Interpreters, who converted the Old Testament about an hundred years before Epiphanes, did also turn this Book of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And, were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers years before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Jaddus the High Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Jerusalem to have destroyed it, this Book of Daniel, wherein he beheld his own glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only stayed his hand from the harm of that City and people; but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future peril and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire, in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

Mac. 1. 11. Jos. ant. 11

It is true indeed, that the Jews themselves give less authority to Daniel, than to Moses and the Prophets; accompting his Book among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say Esdras, and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their return from Babylon. But first, that the Book of Daniel (I mean so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonical; secondly, that it was written by Daniel himself, and not by Esdras and the Seniors; we may assure our selves by testimony of Councils and Fathers. For in the Council of Laodicea, held about the year of our Lord 368. after the death of Jovinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Council three and forty years, this Book of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonical Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the same Council it may be seen; and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Eccleſiastical History, the fourth Book, and five and twentieth Chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonical Books upon Origen: so doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Psalms, and Epiphanius in his Book of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may add St. Hierom, Gregory Nazianzene, and others. For, the Hagiographa-Books, or holy Writings, the Jews and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdras, that wrote this Book, Gods commandment unto him by his Angel, to seal up the same to the time appointed, is an unanswerable testimony. Yea, that which exceedeth all strength of other proof, our Saviour Christ, who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Matthew and Mark alledgeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth Chapter. Further, in the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. Saint Paul describeth Antichrist, out of Daniel; and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels visions.

§. III.

That the seventy years of Captivity are to be numbred from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechoniah.

HAving thus far digressed in maintaining that authority which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we return unto the differences of opinion concerning the beginning of these seventy years. Neither will I stand to trouble my self and others with laying open the grounds or weakness of that which Eusebius, and some few nameless Authors, have sometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Beroaldus; but will forthwith enter into consideration of that opinion, which many, both ancient and late Writers, have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Juda, were carryed away captives to Babylon: First, Manasses; then Jehojakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: Thirdly, Jechonias, and with him Ezekiel: Lastly, Zedechias, at which time the City and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these Captivities, the beginning of the seventy years is referred by none that I have read; to the second, by few, and with weak proof; to the third, by very many, and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Jeremy, which may seem to make the matter plain. For the Prophet, in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonias, useth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After seventy years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place.

Jer. 29. 10.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seek the interpretation of a Prophecy out of circumstances, when the Prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it self. Jeremy hath already, in the fourth year of Jehojakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the sins and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will send, and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babel, my servant; and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about; and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continual desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness; the voice of the Bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride; the noise of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle; and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel seventy years. And when seventy years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here we see prescribed unto the Captivity the term of seventy years: which were to commence, neither when the Prophecy was uttered; nor when Jehojakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Jechonia: but with the utter desolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did again give notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this Prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished; beginning the seventy years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Juda, where it is said thus: They burnt the House of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: and they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were servants to him, and to his Sons, until the Kingdom of the Persians had rule, to fulfil the Word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the dayes that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfil seventy years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia (when the Word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. We seldom find one piece of Scripture, so precisely and plainly expounded by another as in this Prophecy, to have afterwards been the subject of altercation. For one can hardly devise how either the Desolation could have been expressed more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the Prophecy have been more exactly set down, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in so evident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yields testimony sufficient, unto this exposition of Jeremiah his Prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lye waste seventy years. For in the first year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the seventy, Daniel obtained of God the deliverance, that had been promised, by prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by Books the number of the years whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel his own Captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehojakim, and that the people carryed away with Jechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the years of their own Captivity; yet with the general desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabit, began in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great Captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of seventy years.

This I will not further seek to prove, by the authority of Josephus and others affirming the same; forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

§. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the seventy years.

WHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seventy years of the Captivity, and how long each of them did wear the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know; forasmuch as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their reigns, any way helpful to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The conquests, recounted by Xenophon, of Syria, Arabia (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seem fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betook himself to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majesty, where it may seem seem that he and his Heirs kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no less. For, whereas under Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofs) they attempted, and finished that hardy piece of work, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joyning unto it the Continent, filling up the deep and broad channel of the Sea, dividing it from the Main with a mole or piece of Earth, and other matter; the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the Enemy than their bows would carry, but were ready to turn their backs as soon as any, though inferiour in numbers, adventuring within the distance, offered to charge them.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 1. & l. 3. Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars wars, till the ruin of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reign of their several Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vain been taken in that business. For when it is granted, that the Captivity of Judah, ending with that Empire, lasted seventy years, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothful Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Egyptians servitude; resting satisfied in both, with the general assured sum.

Yet forasmuch as many have travelled in this business, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the seventy years, not only by the reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves; I will not refuse to take a little pains in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I think may best be held for likely, if the certain truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting down the years of their several reigns. The first, and (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerly follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any help from others. These name only three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, and Balthasar; Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other, to be their warrant; but the Prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of the Prophet, shewing that he, being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his own will, and making it known that he had put some Countreys here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his Son, and his Sons Son, untill the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. Jer. 27. 7. These words, expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I find no other necessity of qualification to be used herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire, to reconcile the Scriptures unto prophane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the consent of all Histories were on the one side, and the letter of the Holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofs of their different reports, are so slender and unsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not been thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some Author of equal credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good belief, as any of those things which they have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Josephus, derive that Empire, as by descent, from Father to Son, through five generations, beginning with Nabuchodonosor the Great, and giving to him 43 years; to Evilmerodach 18; to Nigliſar the Son of Evilmerodach 40; to Labosardach the Son of Nigliſar 9 months; and lastly, to Balthasar (whom Josephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his Father) 17 years. And this opinion (save that he forbears to reckon the years, and plainly calls Balthasar the Son of Labosardach) Saint Hierom doth follow, alleadging Berosus and Josephus as a Sectator of Berosus, for his Authors; though Berosus, as he is cited by Josephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tells us, that Evilmerodach the Son of Nabuchodonosor did reign but two years, for his wickedness and lust, slain by his Sisters Husband Nizigliſſoroor, who occupied the Kingdom after him four years, and left it to his own Son Labosardach; who being an ill-conditioned Boy, was at the end of nine months slain by such as were about him, and the Kingdom given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17 years.

years. This relation ill agrees with that of Josephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of years, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them some authority; so that the names which they have inserted, are taken as it were upon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last Kings Brethren, and Sons of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather believe Xenophon, who saith, that the last King of Babylon was immediate Successor to his Father. But whereas the Author of the Scholastical History, who is founder of this opinion, placeth between him that took Jerusalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plain enough it is that he hath, out of any History sacred or prophane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius, Severus, and Theodoret, upon better ground have supposed, that Evilmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and Sons of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his Son. And so common grew this explication, that St. Hierom called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthasar was not the Son indeed, but the grand-child of that great Conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the Son.

Annius his Metasthenes hits very rightly the seventy years of Captivity, giving to Nabuchodonosor 45 years, to Evilmerodach 30 years, and to the three Sons of Evilmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonosor, fourteen years; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest Son, three years; to Lab-Assar-Dach the second Son, six years; and to Balthasar the third Son, five.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole sum of years, and in the number of generations, I have sometime subscribed; as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reason, than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my self herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the Modern Writers as deserve to be regarded, have consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar succeed unto his Brother in the Kingdom, and not unto his Father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian war I cannot slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the King was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proof, that the time allotted unto Balthasar by Annius his Metasthenes, was far short of the truth; which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the seventy years he pleased among the rest. For in the third year of Balthasar, Daniel saw a Vision, after which he was sick certain days; but when he rose up, he did the Kings business: from which business, that he did afterwards withdraw himself, and live retired, so long, that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen used to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to think that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worn out of remembrance, were in my judgment a very strange conceit; which rather than I would entertain, I can well be contented to think the whole story (thus related) a part of Annius his Impostures.

Dan. 8. 1. & 27. Dan. 5. 11, 12, 13. Dan 2. 49.

Out of these reports of Josephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by conjectures of late Writers. For, the endurance of the Captivity being 70 years, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his Son and Grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the years of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reigns might fill up the whole continuance of the Captivity; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Evilmerodach and Balthasar, joyned unto the years following the nineteen of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the years of Evilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18 years given to him by Josephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28 years; and the two years that Berosus hath allowed to Evilmerodach, should be written 23. In the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the latter there should have been added the figure of (3) to that of (2): this granted (to wit) that Evilmerodach reigned 28 years, whereof five together with his Father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 23 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonosor lived after after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 48. then 4 years of Nigliſar, according to Beroſus, nine months of Labaſſardach his Son, and 17 years of Labonidus or Balthaſar, make up the number of seventy years to the first of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly mistaken in all Copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who having nothing to help them, save only the bare names of two unknown Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as, if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to have the place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their authority?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reigns of the Babylonian Kings.

OTher suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purposely forbear to rehearse, as falling under the same answer. That of Joseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. He gives to Nebuchadnezzar 44 years, to Evilmerodach two, to Belsazer 5. and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19 of Nebuchadnezzar, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, unto the time of Cyrus, he accounted only 59 years; beginning (as many do) the Captivity 11 years sooner, from the transportation of Jechonia. But hereof enough hath been said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19 of Nebuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldæan Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nebuchadnezzars reign, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Beroſus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Jeremy, that this Evilmerodach in the first of his reign, shewing all favour to Jechonia, did, among other things, take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life. His portion was a continual portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certain, all the days of his life until he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed than the authority of Beroſus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farr longer time than two years, wherein Jechonia, under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandment he had obeyed in yielding himself to Nebuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jechonia did live, it cannot be proved; but plain it is hereby, that all his remaining days he did eat bread before this King. Now that he lived not so short a while after this as two years, it is more than likely; for he was but 55 years when he was set at liberty, having been 37 years in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18 years; after which time it seems plain that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zerobabel, who is said to have been but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages, threescore years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it self.

Jer. 52. 33, 34.

Of Belsazer, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laboroſoardoch, I should wonder why he calls him Nebuchadnezzars daughter's son, were it not that herein I find him very careful to help out Beroſus, by shifting in his Nirigliſſoroor, as husband to Nebuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his son four of these years; by which means there remains about one year to Belsazer alone, agreeing nearly with the nine months assigned by Beroſus to the son of Nigliſar. But Jeremy hath told us, that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his daughters son) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him to pass it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Beroſus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthaſar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firm Beroſian: for Beroſus makes him of the same stock or race, a Babylonian. I speak not this to disgrace the travel of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not so wedded to any Author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himself, having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in general he approveth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no errour. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirm this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Beroſus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdom, not saying that he wann it by force of arms: Secondly, a fragment of Megaſthenes found in Euſebius, wherein this Nabonidus bonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Original, or of the Greek tranſlation, which, expreſſing no force of arms, doth only ſignifie that Darius took or received the Kingdom; I ſee no reaſon why we ſhould thereupon inferr, that the next King entred by Election: ſeeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumſtances of Balthaſars death, but only the ſwift accompliſhment of his own Prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been ſaid (if Daniel had cared to uſe the moſt expreſſive terms) that Darius of the Medes, breaking into the City, did win the Kingdom; ſeeing this was performed by Cyrus in the abſence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his uſe. Now concernng the fragment of Megaſthenes, true it is, that in Euſebius his works Printed at Baſil, in the year 1559. I find only thus much of Megaſthenes, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchodonoſor was more valiant then Hercules; that he ſubdued all Lybia, and the reſt of Aſia, as far as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldæans report, being returned into his Kingdom, and rapt with a divine fury, he cryed with a loud voice: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamity that ſhall come upon you, which neither Bell, nor any of the gods ſhall avert: There will come a Perſian, half an Aſs, that ſhall bring ſlavery upon you: and that, this and the like when he had ſpoken, he vaniſhed. Of all this I believe little or nothing, ſaving that Nabuchodonoſor knew before-hand, that his Empire ſhould be tranſlated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the ſilver breaſt. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I do hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers Copy of Euſebius were the more perfect, out of which Megaſthenes tells us, that Nabuchodonoſor wan both Africk and Spain, I believe the fragment ſo much the leſs; and am as little moved with the authority of it, where it calls a Median, the pride and confidence of the Aſſyrians; as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his own vaniſhing away. Indeed that ſame title (of half an Aſs) by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to ſuſpect the fable, as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, becauſe his parentage was more noble on the Mothers ſide than on the Fathers; as Mules are begotten by Aſſes upon Mares. And thus much in anſwer of the two principal foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within in ſelf, I eaſily allow it. But this proves nothing; for meer fictions have not wanted theſe commendations: neither can any man believe that one ſo judicious, induſtrious, and deeply learned as Joſeph Scaliger, would overſhoot himſelf, in ſetting down repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it ſeems that Scaliger, well knowing his own ſufficiency, hath been little careful to ſatisfie men that would frame Arguments againſt him. For if the Prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdom of Balthaſar was divided, and given to the Medes and Perſians; either we muſt think that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or elſe we muſt bethink our ſelves what Perſian it might be that ſhared the Kingdom with him. For it is not more certain, that Balthaſar loſt his life and Kingdom, then that his Kingdom was divided and given to the Medes and Perſians. Neither did the Medes and Perſians fall out and fight for it, as, by ſuppoſing Nabonidus to have been Darius, they ſhould be thought to have done; but theſe two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the ſubject Provinces; inſomuch that the Greek Hiſtorians did commonly call thoſe wars which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The wars of the Medes. Yea, to clear this point, even Daniel himſelf reſembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ramm with two horns, calling him the King of the Medes and Perſians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Joſeph Scaliger, for maintaining upon ſuch good grounds, that Darius of the Medes was partner with Cyrus, in his victories, and not a Chaldæan King by him ſubdued. Neither was Joſephus to be the leſs regarded, for affirming that Balthaſar was deſtroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus; though herein he varied from Beroſus and others, whoſe authority elſewhere he gladly citeth. For Joſephus had no reaſon to believe any mans faith or knowledge of thoſe times half ſo well as Daniels, whom I believe that he underſtood as far as was needful in this caſe. Lawful it was for him to alleadge all Authors that had any mention, though unperfect, of the ſame things that were contained in the writings of the Jews, to whoſe Hiſtories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were ſtrangers, and might ſeem fabulous. Even ſo do Euſebius and other Writers willingly embrace the teſtimonies of Heathen books making for the truth in ſome particulars; yet will they not therefore be tryed in general by the ſelf-ſame Ethnick Philoſophers, phers, but leave them where they are againſt the truth; as Joſephus in this caſe hath left Beroſus. And thus much I thought it meet to ſay of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding nevertheleſs in due regard his learning and judgement, which if in ſome things it had not failed, the miracle had then been very great.

§. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Perſons and Times of Nabuchodonoſor his ſucceſſors.

IT now remains that I freely acknowledge mine own weakneſs, who cannot find how the ſeventy years of Captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I find that the diſtribution made of them, in ſuch wiſe as already is rehearſed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly ſay with Pererius, that we ought liberally to pardon thoſe whoſe feet have failed them in the ſlippery waies of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are ſubject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulneſs, or heedleſs reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding thoſe only to have reigned over the Chaldæans, whoſe names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reaſon and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearſed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he ſuppoſeth by Nigliſar and Laboſardach to be meant the ſame perſons which are called in Scriptures Evilmerodach and Balthaſar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but only to ſhew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of ſeventy years. Firſt therefore let us conſider the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, in whoſe eighteenth year Jeruſalem was taken and ſackt, but in his nineteenth laid utterly deſolate.

Moſt of Writers have given to him 43 years of reign, following therein Beroſus. There are who have added one year more; and ſome have made it up 45. To diſpute about the certainty were needleſs: for in ſhewing by what length of time the Scripures meaſure him, we ſhall ſhew the certain truth.

Manifeſt it is, that the 19 year of Nebuchadnezzar, is joyned with the 11 of Zedechia; as alſo that his eighth year, was the firſt year of Jechonia his Captivity; the reign of Zedechia occupied all the mean ſpace, being of 11 years. This is generally agreed upon, ſo that it needs no further proofs: As for the beginning of his ſucceſſor Evilmerodach, it was in the ſeven and thirtieth year of Jechonia his Captivity; ſo that Nebuchadnezzar after his eighth year (which was the firſt of Jechonia his bondage) reigned 35 whole years, and peradventure a good part of the ſix and thirtieth, foraſmuch as Jechonia was inlarged with ſo great a favour, not until the end of the year. Subſtracting therefore out of theſe four and forty, which Nebuchadnezzar's reign did well-near occupy, thoſe eighteen years of his which paſſed away before the captivity of Juda, and ruin of the City, we have remaining ſix and twenty years of the Seventy, that were almoſt wholly ſpent when his Son began to reign.

It is now to be conſidered, how the remainder of the ſeventy years were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon until the firſt of Cyrus. A queſtion more difficult (as I ſaid before) than greatly needful: the whole ſumm being certain, and the diſtinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were ſlothful Princes. Neither can any man the more juſtly ſuſpect the beginning or end of the whole ſeventy years; for that the diſtribution of ſome part of them is only conjectural; ſeeing that none who gives any other terms to their beginning or end, hath refuſed to follow both unlikely and deſperate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to do as others have done; knowing well before-hand, that whoſoever ſhall diſcover my error, muſt do me the pleaſure (which I could rather wiſh in a caſe more material) of making me to underſtand the truth.

Of the four and forty years remaining in account of Nebuchadnezzar's death, we are to take away the laſt, which was the firſt of Darius the Mede, and then having authority good enough to warrant us from blame of preſumption, in giving us ſeventeen years to Balthaſar, we find left in our hands to beſtow upon Evilmerodach ſix and twenty years. Of the year belonging unto Darius the Mede, I have already ſpoken what I thought ſufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this Captivity. That Balthaſar did reign ſeventeen years, we have the authority of Joſephus before cited in expreſs words: We have alſo the general conſent of all, or the moſt late Writers, interpreting Beroſus his Nabonidus, who reigned ſo long, and Balthaſar to have been one. But nothing moved me ſo much to believe this Tradition, as first those evi-

Dan. 8. 1. & 27. & c. 5. v. 11, 12, & 13. dent places in Daniel, shewing that in the third year of Balthasar he followed the Kings business, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reign, (a proof sufficient of no few years, passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels employments took end either that year or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his wars against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans Father, and being alwayes prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time; though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the mid-way: I have already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reign of Evilmerodach was not short, and that men of great judgement have found it most probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I think, they would have allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that Books of such antiquity, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yield in many dark passages of Antiquity. I will yet confess, that were his works never so excellent, and in all things else unquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend unto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy: How much less ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seven or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they believe that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures have told us, that God gave the Em-
Jer. 27. 7. pire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his Son, and to his Sons Son: How long each of them held it, we find not Expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach us; provided alwaies, that helping us in a particularity, he destroyed not thereby the general truth. More words are needless. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus, or Josephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelessness of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to err in writing two for six and twenty, as for three and twenty, or perhaps more easie. For, the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5, signifying 6, hath a nearer resemblance of β that stands for 2, than hath γ which is used for 3. So that the numeral notes β 5, expressing 26, were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true Copy, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not unusual, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seem not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in εγ standing for 23, I do not well perceive. As for the Arithmetical figures now in use, they were long after the time of Josephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore do not appertain unto this business; unless we should guess that his works were corrupted in that unlearned age, which following the Saracen-conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanity, but in a sort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; If not, I will not purchase the favour of his authority, by forsaking Jeremy and Daniel when they seem to be his Opposites.

Of the Victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained between the destruction of Jerusalem, and conquest of Egypt.

With what actions this time of seventy years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it self was, and is yet, sought to be abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people even their Being. For every Nation (I know not whom I should except) between the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothful age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no marvel, if the posterity of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have desired, betook themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigal Sons of greedy Fathers, their own wisdom greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restless travel of purchasing: Though indeed the reign of Nabuchodonosor was so divided, that his youthful and stronger years having been exercised in victorious arms, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy labours past. The nineteenth year of his reign it was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty City of Jerusalem, he enriched riched himſelf with abundance of ſpoil, and terrified all that would offer to reſiſt him, by that fearful example. From that time forward, he, until his three and twentieth year, laboured in the conqueſt of thoſe adjoyning Regions, which God had expoſed unto his ſword, and commanded to wear his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sydonians, and Egyptians; though ſome of theſe were already become his followers, and ſerved under him, when Jeruſalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whoſe City was founded on an Iſland, ſafe enough from any danger of a Land-army, and whoſe Fleet was ſo ſtrong, that they needed not to fear any enemy at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour-Cities, nor with the obſtinate reſolution of this mighty Prince, imploying all his power to their ſubverſion.

That the City of Tyre was rather well pleaſed, than any way diſcouraged with the fall of Jeruſalem (which had held the ſame courſe that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the ſame quarrel againſt the common enemy) it appears by the words Ezek.26.2. which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for ſeeing ſhe is deſolate, I ſhall be repleniſhed. Yet at length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonoſor, that great work of his, whereof we have already ſpoken, began to appear above the waters, and threaten them with inevitable miſchief.

Jer. 25. Iſa.23. 55. But thoſe Prophecies of Jeremy and of Eſay, which appoint unto this deſolation of Tyre the ſame term of ſeventy years, that was preſcribed unto the reign of the Chaldæans, do plainly ſhew, that ſhe followed Jeruſalem, the ſame nineteenth year of Nabuchodonoſor, in the ſame, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtleſs were memorable in the iſſue of ſo great and laborious a ſiege, are in a manner utterly loſt. Thus much we find, That the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themſelves, and fled into the Iſle of Cyprus. Nevertheleſs, it ſeems that this evaſion ſerved only the principal men, who eſcaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer ſort unto the enemies fury. For, not only ſuch people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the ſword; but the like execution was done in the ſtreets, into which, with exceſſive labour, the Aſſyrian made way for his Horſes and Chariots. Thus Ezek.29.18. Nabuchodonoſor cauſed his Army to ſerve a great ſervice againſt Tyrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every ſhoulder was made bare, yet had he no wages, nor his Army; but was fain to reſt contented with the Honour of having deſtroyed that City, which in all mens judgements had been held invincible.

The deſtruction of theſe two great and powerful Cities, having made the name of the Chaldæans dreadful in the ears of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonoſor uſed the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with leſs pain. The Kingdom of Egypt was the Mark at which he aimed; a Country ſo abounding in all riches and pleaſures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himſelf ſtrong enough, to ſeek occaſion of quarrel againſt it; and ſo far an enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that, had it been poorer, yet either it muſt have been ſubdued, or the conqueſt of Syria could ill have been eſtabliſhed. Nevertheleſs it was needful, that before he entred into this buſineſs, the Countries adjacent ſhould be reduced unto ſuch terms, that either they ſhould wholly ſtand at his devotion, or at leaſt be unable to work him any diſpleaſure. And herein the Decree of God concurred, as in all proſperous enterpriſes, with reaſon of State. For, the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damaſcus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adjoyning Regions, whom God for their ſins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian ſwords, were ſuch, as regarding only their own gain, had ſome of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldæan Army, to feed upon the carkaſſes that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miſeries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonoſor: all of them thinking, that when the Aſſyrian had ſatisfied his fury, he ſhould be fain to forſake thoſe deſolate parts, and leave the poſſeſſion of thoſe that could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philiſtims had ſhewed much malice to the Jews when their City was taken. What good ſervice they had done to the Chaldæans, I find not; if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own purpoſes, wherein they were diſappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Jeruſalem, but preſently they entred upon the Country of Gad, and took poſſeſſion; as if not the Aſſyrians, but they had ſubdued Iſrael. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practice had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he ſent Iſhmael, a Prince of the blood of Juda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israel, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Country the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroiling Nabuchodonosor, with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his own Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himself and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy the Moabites did exercise, whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God; and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

Ezek. 25. 12. & 15.

Ezek 25.3. Jer.49. 1.

*Jer.*40.14. & 41. 2. & 10. Jer. 28. 27, &c.

All these Nations had the art of ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their theevish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their devices by sharp and sudden war, overwhelming them with unexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the Prophecies of Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatness and swiftness of the misery that should come upon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seems that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so do many good Authors interpret the Prophecy of Esay, threatning Moab with destruction after three years, as having reference to the third year following the ruine of Jerusalem; the next year after it being spent in the Egyptian Expedition. This is manifest, that all the principal Towns in these Regions were burnt, and the people slain, or made slaves, few excepted, who being preserved by flight, had not the courage to return to their habitations over-hastily, much less to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor; but lived as miserable Out-laws, or at least oppressed wretches, untill the end of seventy years, which God had prescribed unto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

Isa. 16.14.

§. VIII.

That Ægypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slain by Nabuchodonosor, contrary to the opinion of most Authors: who, following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

WHen by a long course of victory, Nabuchodonosor had brought into subjection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemy to himself, nor friend to the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might give impediment upon his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forthwith take in hand the conquest of Egypt himself, upon which those other Nations had formerly been depending. Of this Expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needless to look after more authority, or to cite for proof half of that which may be alleadged out of these. Nevertheless, we find many and good Authors, who following Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to strain these Prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a sense, as gives to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of having done some spoil in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a Chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affairs. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the means and second helps conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they do preferr the Commentator before the Author; and, to uphold a sentence, giving testimony to one clause, do carelesly overthrow the History it self, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former Book: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved unto this place. Herodotus doth affirm, that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unless we should understand that he was victorious in the War, which he is said to have made upon Tyrus and Sydon) that he reigned five and twenty years; and was finally taken and put to death by his own Subjects; who did set up Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians he imputeth to a great loss which they received in an Expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Army was destroyed. This calamity the people of Egypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous Expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater security reign over such as stayed at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slain, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole

Land

Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust unto his forein Mercenaries; the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readiness thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting unto two hundred and fifty thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of War. Apries himself being taken prisoner, was gently entreated by Amasis for a while, untill the Egyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extream enemy to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gave him honourable burial. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth neerly agree; telling us, that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phœnicians in battel at Sea, took by force and demolished Sidon, wann the other Towns of Phœnicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished, as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned two and twenty years. This authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to inform us of Apries his history, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than have the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greek Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that look only into humane reasons. For Esay prophecied long before of the shameful Captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Assur, should carry away naked, young and old, in such wise, that the Jews, who fled then for deliverance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their own vain confidence in men so unable to defend themselves.

Diod. Sic. l. 1. c. 2.

Isa. 20 4, 5, & 6.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their Prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, so they handled this argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nebuchadnezzar, as wages for the service which he had done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chief Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and go into Captivity; yea, that Pharaoh and all his Army should be slain by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniform consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Jews in Egypt should see Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had been, were to be referred unto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the general opinion hath over-ruled it; then was it vainly done of the same Prophet (which, God forbid that any Christian should think, seeing he did it by the appointment of God himself) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, those very stones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his Pavilion spread. Yea then was that Prophecy no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visit the common people of No, and Pharaoh and Egypt, with their gods, and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of those that seek their lives, and into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his servants. The clearness of this Prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it; who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greek Historians. Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lyes, coyned upon a vain-glorious purpose of hiding their own disgrace and bondage. And surely, it may well be thought, that the history of Nebuchadnezzar was better known to the Jews, whom it concerned, than to the Greeks, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather believe Josephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three and twentieth year of his reign, and the fifth year of the destruction of Jerusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodore; who being meer strangers to this business, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of authority, we should only consider the relations of Josephus, and of the Greek Historians, as either of them might be verified of it self by apparent circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; methinks the death of Apries can no way be approved, as having having been wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspicion; yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great love and honour which the Egyptians did bear unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniform testimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the report of Diodore himself. How then can we think it probable, that Apries having wonn great victories, did for one only loss fall into the hatred of all his people? or, which may serve to perswade us, that a King of Egypt would seek, or so demean himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his natural subjects? As for that Army of thirty thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amasis took prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: Doth it not argue that he was a forreiner, and one that armed himself against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weak; rather then any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their own, as the strength of their own bodies? It were more tedious than any way needful, to use all Arguments that might be alleadged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was some forein Governour, not a natural Prince; otherwise the people would have desired to save his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yielded, though it had stood upon great appearance of truth, considering that the voice of truth it self cries out against it; but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, to be observed where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

Joſ. Ant. Jud. l. 10. c. 11.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nebuchadnezzar.

IT is a great loss, that the general History of the World hath suffered by the spoil and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments that should have preserved the memory of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Virtue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertain. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Wars had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth up in his 30 Chapter (besides the whole Country of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations, that may seem to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Wars are in a manner utterly lost; but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to conferr the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I think worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Book) thought himself most safe in Egypt by the well defenced situation of his Country, did very unwisely in suffering his enemies to sweep the way clean unto his own doors, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For, as the labour of this business did more harden, than weary the Chaldæan Army; so the confidence and vain security of the Egyptians, relying upon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great River of Nilus would afford unto themselves, did little avail them in provision for the War, and much astonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually seen, that the hearts of men fail, when those helps fail, in which they had reposed more confidence, than in their own virtue. Hitherto the Kingdom of Egypt had flourished under the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred and fourscore years; but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatness; yet so, that it was never dreadful unto others; God having said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For, whereas it hath been said of Pharaoh: I am the Son of the Wise, I am the Son of the Ancient Kings: And whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fools, the River failed them, the King himself was taken and slain, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to pass in the first year after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar; at which time (saith Josephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his room, and carried Captives thence to Babylon the Jews whom he found in that Country. Now concerning Ezek. 29. 13, 14, & 15. Isa. 19. 11. Ezek. 29. 9.

Joſ. Ant. Jud. l. 20. c. 11.

cerning the time which Joſephus gives unto this buſineſs, and the buſineſs it ſelf, I have already ſhewed, that it is warranted by all the Prophecies which inſinuate the ſame. As likewiſe the laſt deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and carrying away thoſe unto Babel; who inhabited the miſerable ruins of that great City, which was in the ſame three and twentieth year of Nebuchadnezzar, is not unprobably thought by good Authors to have been at the return from this Egyptian Expedition. But whereas Joſephus tells us, that there was another King put in the room of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, we muſt underſtand, that he was only a Vice-roy, and not (as ſome have miſtaken it) think that this was Amaſis. For to place the beginning of Amaſis his reign in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant unto the prophecies before alleadged, as to all Chronology and Hiſtory. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience, imagine that there were two ſucceſſively bearing the name of Amaſis; others, that there were two Apries, the one ſlain by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amaſis; a queſtion of ſmall importance, becauſe the difference is only about a name, it being once granted, that the perſon mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life and Kingdom by the Aſſyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries, of whom the Greek Hiſtorians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nebuchadnezzar, ſeeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharaoh Necho, and made war (as they report) upon the Phœnicians; who were, before the Egyptians, become ſubject unto the Crown of Babylon. I might add, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to have had ſome Chaldæan or Aſſyrian, than Egyptian name, unleſs we ſhould think that he had been a Traitor to his natural Prince, and ſo rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantſhip of the Country: about which it were but frivolous to diſpute. Thus much in brief we ought to believe, that Nabuchodonoſor made an abſolute Conqueſt of Egypt; that he was not ſo fooliſh as to give it away, any man may gueſs; that he appointed one to rule the Country, it is conſequent unto the former, and hath authority of Joſephus; that his Governour (or ſome ſucceſſor of his) was afterwards taken and ſlain by Amaſis, I ſee probability enough to perſwade my ſelf, and yet can well be content, that others uſe their liberty, and believe what they liſt. As for the Army which this Egyptian King Apries is ſuppoſed to have kept of Ionians and Carians, I hold them to be none other than the garriſons of mercenary ſouldiers which were left by the Aſſyrian for the guard of his Vice-roy, and cuſtody of the new ſubdued Province: as likewiſe the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who, together with the friends of ſuch as were ſlain in that Expedition, remembred before out of the Greek Hiſtorians, depoſed and ſlew Apries, I take them to have been the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their own Country. Sure it is, that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified; At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were ſcattered, and I will bring again the Captivity of Egypt, and will cauſe them to return into the Land of Pathros, into the Land of their habitation, and they ſhall be there a ſmall Kingdom. If the Egyptian Prieſts alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amaſis obtaining the Kingdom; then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deviſed matter that had no ſhadow of truth, only to keep the Greeks from knowledge of their Countries diſgrace, then are they little to be reguarded, ſince we know the truth with them.

Of the ſundry accounts drawn from ſundry acts of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the deſtruction of Ninive, by him; the time of which action is uncertain.

THeſe victories brought the greatneſs of the Aſſyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's reign in ſundry places of Scripture. To ſpeak any more of the queſtions ariſing about the ſupputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might ſeem to be the overhandling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note, that whereas Daniel was carried captive in the third year of Jehojakims reign (which ran along with ſome part of Nebuchadnezzar's firſt year) and was kept in diet three years more, before he was brought into the Kings preſence; It could not be the ſecond of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, fore-ſhewing the ſucceſs of Monarchies, but the ſecond of his Empire. The ſame or the like may be ſaid of divers places which refer ſundry matters unto their ſet years; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tells, that Egypt ſhould be given in reward for the ſervice done before Tyrus, dating his Prophecy in the

the seven and twentyeth year; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth year: for these years held no dependance upon either the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's Kingdom, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the Captivities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertain search.

Of any War made by Nebuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I do not read: excepting that against Nineve, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nahum. Nineve had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath been shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who, rebelling against the Chaldæan, as Jehojakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Juda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Nineve followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made between this City, that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But, how long after this came to pass, it is (methinks) impossible to find out. For, whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, the place of Nahum last cited, it is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some unto the first of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian Wars; the whole Prophecy of Nahum, which went between the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this destruction, or other circumstances of the War, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like unto the vain curiosity of Tiberius Cæsar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle pains which he should take, who would seek to learn what woman that Huzzah Queen of Nineve was, whose woful Captivity the same Prophet Nahum likewise did fore-tell.

Nahum 3.8.

§. XI.

Of the latter time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madness, and death.

OF the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I think there are no Monuments extant, save those which we find among the Propheſies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great works of Babylon, wherewith he pleased himself so well, that he brake out into those glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have built, for the house of the Kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Majesty? Surely if those things be true that are by Josephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megasthenes, he might well delight himself with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that, besides other stately works, he raised those huge Arches wherewith were born up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the Air, and equalling the tops of Mountains; which most sumptuous Frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to have been reared, and finished in fifteen daies.

Dan. 4. 27.

But of all this and other his magnificence, we find little else recorded, than that (which indeed is most profitable for us to consider) his over-valuing of his own greatness abased him unto a condition inferiour to the poorest of men. And not undeservedly fell these judgments of God upon him. For, whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happiness in his own life, but with a discovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet; he nevertheless became so forgetful of God, whose wonderful power he had seen and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set up and worshipped; ordaining a cruel death as reward unto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was utterly repugnant to the Law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof St. Hierom hath well noted; Velox oblivio veritatis, ut qui dudum servum Dei quasi Deum adoraverat, nunc statuam sibi fieri jubeat, ut ipse quasi Deus in Statua adoraretur: A hasty forgetfulness of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the servant of God, as if he had been God himself, should now command a Statua to be erected unto himself, wherein himself might be worshipped as God. From this impiety it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderful delivery of those blessed Saints out of the fiery furnace; who being thrown into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted by an Angel; preserved from all harm of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nebuchadnezzar, was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hasty zeal. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dream of the terrible judgement hanging over his head, which Daniel expounding, advised him to break off his sin by righteousness, and his iniquity by mercy towards the poor, that there might be an healing of his errour. Hereby it seems that injustice and cruelty were the faults, for which he was threatned: but this threatning sufficed not unto his information. For, that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men (according to the tenor of the dream and interpretation); yea, compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to eat grass as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans judgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dream; and much more easily be forgotten at the years end. One whole years leisure to repent, was given to this haughty Prince: which respite of the execution may seem to have bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelve moneths, walking in the royal Palace of Babel, he was so over-joyed and transported with a vain contemplation of his own seeming happiness, that, without all fear of Gods heavy judgement pronounced against him, he uttered those lofty words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Majestical works which he had reared, as well beseeming his Majestical person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from Heaven, telling him that his Kingdom was departed from him, rehearsed over unto him the sentence again, which was fulfilled upon him the very same hour.

That Solomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their own buildings, It cannot any way be doubted; yet I do not remember that ever I have read of any, that were punished for rejoycing in works of this kind (though it is hard in joy, or any passion of the mind, to keep a just measure) excepting only this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of David: for other (and some very godly) Kings have mustred all their forces to the very last man; but few or none have been known to have been punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawful to rejoyce in those good things wherewith God hath blessed us; but a note of much unthankfulness to entertain them with a sullen and unfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reverence to God is wanting, are no better than obscure clouds hindring the influence of that blessed Light, which clarifies the soul of man, and predisposeth it unto the brightness of eternall felicity; so that insolent joy, which man in the pride of his vain imagination conceiveth of his own worth, doth above all other passions blast our minds, as it were with lightning, and make us to reflect our thoughts upon our seeming inherent Greatness, forgetting the whilst him, to whom we are indepted for our very Being. Wherefore these Mala mentis gaudia, The evil joyes of the mind were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latin Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed farther inward than sorrows, cares, and fears; not far from the Iron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely token of vengeance near at hand, when these unreasonable flushes of proud and vain joy, do rage in a mind, that should have been humbled with a just repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deserving.

This was verified upon Nebuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and unexampled. For he ran among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seven years he lived, not only as a salvage man, but as a salvage beast; for a beast he thought himself, secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himself in the same manner, and with the same food that beasts do: Not that he was changed in figure external, according to Mediana, insomuch as he appeared a Beast to other mens eyes, as St. Hierom in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius only a woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hind; nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but, according to St Hierom's exposition of these words, At the same time was my understanding restored unto me, &c. Quando dicit (saith St. Hieram) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse, sed mentem; When he saith that his sense was restored unto him, he shewed that he had not lost his humane shape, but his understanding. Seven years expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his understanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and everlasting being; that he was the Lord of Heaven and Earth, and wrought wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his wayes righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely St. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthasar; because Esay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapters, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon joyntly.

§. XII.

Of Evilmerodach.

HAving already spoken what I could of the succession and years of Nebuchadnezzar's posterity, the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here again rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdom burning in a war that consumed it to ashes. He lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth year of his reign, which was forty years after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis four and forty years of reign; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, saying, that he died in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty years, which passed between the second year of the four and fiftieth Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fifth of Cambyses his reign, wherein he wann Egypt; of which seven and thirty years it is credibly held, that Psammiticus, the Son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than four and thirty years. But seeing that these two Greek Historians have been abused by Egyptian Priests in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvel though they were also deceived in the length of his reign. This is the plain answer to this objection. For to say, either that the numbers were mis-written, and four and forty set down instead of four and thirty; or that Amasis did temporize a while with the Assyrians, and not bear himself as absolute King of Egypt, until the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became again a Kingdom) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian-troubles did animate the King of the Medes, to deal with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces or, whether (as I rather think) some foil received by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldned the Egyptians to rebel against him; I will neither undertake, nor seek to define. Xenophon tells, that the first service of young Cyrus in war, was under Astyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set upon him; at which time, Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen years old. If therefore Cyrus lived threescore and three years (as he is said to have died well stricken in years) which is held to be the ordinary terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third year of Evilmerodach his reign. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the war began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand upon prowder terms with the Assyrians, than in his flowrishing estate they durst have used. Howsoever the quarrel began, we find that it ended not before the last ruin of the Assyrian Monarchy. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes, and their Allies the Persians, drew unto his party the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to overwhelm his enemies with a strong Invasion, whom in vain he had sought to weary out with a lingring War.

Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 8.

This happened after the death of Astyages, who left the world in the nineteenth year of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis took possession of Egypt. So that the Assyrian having his hands already full of business, which more earnestly did affect him, seems thereby to have given the better means unto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdom, which by long distance of place, did sundry times find occasion to rebel in after-ages, and set up a King within it self, against the far more mighty Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way until the fulfilling of those Prophecies, which were many years before uttered against Babel, by Esay and Jeremy.

For,

For, the Aſſyrians and their Confederates, who, truſting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Perſians under their thick ſhowers of arrows and darts, were encountred with an Army of ſtout and well-trained men, weightily armed for cloſe fight, by whom they were beaten in open battel, wherein Evilmerodach was ſlain. So, that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonoſor had raiſed and upheld, being ſhaken and grievouſly crackt under his unfortunate Son, was left to be ſuſtained by his unworthy Nephew; a man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greateſt and ſtrongeſt, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

A private conjecture of the Author; ſerving to make good thoſe things, which are cited out of Beroſus, concerning the Succeſſors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The quality, and death of Balthaſar.

THough I have already (as it ſeems to me) ſufficently proved that Balthaſar was the Son, and immediate Succeſſor to Evilmerodach, yet conſidering earneſtly the conjectures of thoſe Writers, which, following Beroſus, inſert Nigliſſar, or Nirigliſſoroor, and his Son Labaſſardach between them; as alſo that which I find in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queen of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not ſuperfluous here in this place to ſhew, by what means it was poſſible, that ſome errour might have crept into the Hiſtory of thoſe times, and thereby have brought us to a needleſs trouble of ſearching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the uncertain fragments of loſt Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. Firſt therefore I obſerve, that the time which Beroſus divides betwixt Evilmerodach, and ther two next Kings, agrees with the years in which Nebuchadnezzar lived wild among brute beaſts in the open field: Secondly, that the ſuddenneſs of this accident, which came in one hour, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtleſs the honour of ſo noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamity pitied, and his reſtitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clauſe which promiſed his recovery, as being verified in that which had been more incredible. Now if we do in common reaſon judge, what courſe was like to be taken by the great Ones of the Kingdom, for ſetling the Government, whilſt the King was thus diſtracted, we ſhall find it moſt likely, that his Son and Heir did occupy the Royal Throne, with condition to reſtore it unto his Father, when God ſhould enable him to repoſſeſs it. In this his rule Evilmerodach being to ſupply the utter want of underſtanding in his Father, as Protectors do the unripeneſs of it in young, but reaſonable Kings, Might eaſily either commit the inſolences, or fall into the troubles, incident to ſuch an office. That he had in him very ſmall ability of Government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when he held it in his own right. That his Siſter Nitocris (if Notocris were his Siſter) was an woman of a high ſpirit; it appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, ſaying, That ſhe was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and uſeful works about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon againſt the Medes, who had gotten many Towns from the Aſſyrians, and amongſt them Nineve. Wherefore it were not unreaſonable to think, that ſuch a woman, ſeeing how the Empire went to decay through her Brothers miſ-government, uſed practices to get the rule into her own hands, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leave it unto her ungracious Son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, we do not find; but we find in Beroſus (as Joſephus hath cited him) that Nigliſſar, who got the Kingdom from Evilmerodach, was his Siſters Husband; which argues this to have been the ſame woman. As for Labaſſardach the Son of Nigliſſar, if at the end of nine moneths reign he were for his lewd conditions ſlain by the Nobility, as the ſame Beroſus reporteth; it ſeems that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzar's reſtitution (whoſe term of puniſhment was then expired) by raiſing ſuch trouble, as ſhould make him the more deſired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here uſe many words to confute that which Beroſus hath further ſet down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was ſlain by his Siſters Husband: For the plain words of the Scripture, naming the year wherein he gave liberty to Jeconia, do plainly teſtifie that he out-lived the three or four and fortieth year of his Fathers reign, which was the laſt of his life.

Herodot. l. 1.

This may ſuffice to ſhew, that they who are ſaid to have ſucceeded Evilmerodach in the Kingdom, might indeed have ſo done, though not when he held it in his own right. Of Balthaſar, who was his Son and Heir, we find, that he had ſuch conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruin of the people. He was from his young years of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slain a Noble young man that should have married his Sister, only for spight and envy to see him kill two wild beasts in hunting, at which himself having thrown his Javelin had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said, It were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him unto the enemy as soon as he was King. Neither do I find that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a fool he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to give battel to them that daily took somewhat from him. Yet carelessly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on every side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a fool taken in unexcusable security, yet had not that happiness, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of fear, but was terrified with a dreadful vision; which had shewed his ruin not in many hours before, even whilst he was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reign of seventy years, he perished like a beast, and was slain as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affairs, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story, that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the original and first greatness of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were the chief actors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joyned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria, and of Media it self.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himself, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provincial Governours having cut down the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided between them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two years after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions as well of the Conqueror, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achæmenes; the Princes of which blood reigning in Persia, had formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the world.

Of the Family of the Achæmenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third Son of Japhet. That they had Kings soon after the Flood, Lactantius and Diodorus have found record; For Lactantius remembreth an antient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seven Sons, Slain by the Assyrians in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these:

Arbaces	reigned	28	years.
Sorsamus		30	years.
Medidus		40	years.
Cardiceas		13	years.
Diocles		53	years.
Phraortes		24	years.
Cyaxares		32	years.
Astyages		38	years.
Darius Medus

And

And though the Greeks ascribe the Conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us, that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Army victorious over Balthasar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was, during his own life. For we find in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdom being threescore and two years old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdom. And so was it prophesied by Esay long before: Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremy; The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Castor, Thallus, and others, delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Justin and Herodotus are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

HOw the Kingdom of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians; But rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the Conquest of Babel to the Persians only. For some there are who deny that Astyages had any other Successor than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom he called Astigas or Apania) but only that having vanquished him in battel, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited, and seldom followed, and himself sometimes very justly reproved of wilful untruth.

Viginier, a diligent and learned historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such Son as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm this opinion the more he citeth Diodore, Justin, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon; who do not find any such Successor. Neither do Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Julius, Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, St. Hierom, or St. Augustin, make report out of any faithful Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Successor to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negativè, doth never inforce consent; we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleadged notwithstanding) to affirm, that either Astyages himself must have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; or else to give him some other successor, according to Josephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chief, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest; Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Army, and subject to his authority; the strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being joyned together to compound it.

But it is very certain, that the honour of that great victory over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himself for this action, but for the delivery of his Church, a greater work not only in the eyes of God, than the subversion of any State or Monarchy how powerful soever.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers employed in that service did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of war, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling upon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posterity, did much augment the fame of his vertue; which among prophane Historians over-grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in person; as also because he soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possest of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried far off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relation of the Persians, who gave to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the first, fifth, and sixth Chapters of his Prophecy, makes it plain, that himself not only lived a great Officer under King

King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus; which being the year of Daniel's death, could not have been distinguished from the reign of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned joyntly: Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdom by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§. III.

Xenophon's relation of the War with the Medes and Persians, made with joynt forces upon the Assyrians and others.

THese Testimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these Wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries; he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his subjection, there should not then be left any Nation adjoyning, able to make head against him. For, the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being joyned, made an exceeding strong Army.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Crœsus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the less, to his assistance, alleadging, that those Eastern Nations were very powerful, and so firmly conjoyned by league, and many alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthned with great Presents, he drew to himself so many adherents, as he compounded an Army of two hundred thousand foot, and threescore thousand horse; of which, ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot were led by Crœsus, who had great cause of enmity with the Medes, in regard of the War made by them against his Father Alyattes: But this great Army was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus General of the Persian forces, utterly broken: Upon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slain, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it self could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summs of mony out of Asia the less, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, possest himself of a great part of the lesser Asia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Crœsus himself was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soon after, the Army lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon called Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his Sisters Son, prevailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set down.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him levied, are numbered thirty thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as used the Dart or Sling: So far Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Heroical Prince, with much Poetical addition: so it cannot be denied, but that the bulk and gross of his Narration was founded upon meer Historical truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like Writers, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himself to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Moral and Politick discourse, and examining but the History of things done, it will easily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his under-taken subject in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

§. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times foregoing this great War.

FOr it is commonly agreed upon, that Achæmenes, the Son of Perses, being Governour of Persia, did associate himself with Arbaces, who commanded in Media, in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victory obtained, held for himself the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conveyed over the same honour and power to their posterity: which in Media was not absolutely Regal, but with some restraint limited, until such time as Deioces took upon him the full authority and majesty of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reign of Deioces, are usually accounted about an hundred and forty years; in the last sixty whereof, there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes, namely, namely, Salmanaſſar and his Succeſſors; whoſe great atchievements in Syria and elſewhere, witneſs, that the Medes and Perſians found it not for their advantage to undertake any offenſive war againſt thoſe victorious Kings, it being alſo probable, that the league continued as yet between theſe the ſucceſſors of Belochus and Arbaces, who had formerly ſhared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the firſt of Aſtyages, there paſt above ninety years, in which, if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Perſia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Aſia, it had been but an unadviſed enterprize of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, to have waſted themſelves againſt the Syrians, and Egyptians, leaving ſo able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Perſia; and that the Perſians themſelves were not Maſters of Suſiana in Nabuchodonoſor's time; it is manifeſt in Daniel, who was then Governor for the Babylonian in Suſa, or Suſan, the chief City thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares, or Aſtyages, or both, had quarrel with Halyattes the Father of Cræſus, which, after ſome ſix years diſpute, was compounded.

How the affairs of Perſia ſtood in ſo many ages, I do not find any memory. It ſeemeth that the roughneſs of the mountainous Country which they then poſſeſt, with the confederacy which they continued with the Medes, gave them more ſecurity than fame: For if their Kings, being the poſterity of Achæmenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatneſs which they afterward obtained, would not have ſuffered any forgetfulneſs thereof. But as we find all Xenophon's reports, both of theſe Wars, and the ſtate of thoſe Countries to be very conſonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors; ſo it appears, that the race of Achæmenes held the Principality of Perſia from Father to Son for many diſcents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the Father of Cyrus was King of Perſia; than to thoſe that make him a mean man, and ſay, that Aſtyages gave him his Daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her Son (whoſe nativity he feared) might be diſabled from any great undertaking by his Fathers ignobility.

For, what cauſe of grief could it be to Aſtyages, that the Son of his Daughter ſhould become Lord of the beſt part of Aſia? No, it was more likely, that upon ſuch a Prophecy his love to his Grand-child ſhould have increaſed, and his care been the greater to have married her to ſome Prince of ſtrength and eminent virtue.

Yea, the ſame Herodotus, who is the firſt Author, and, as I think, the deviſer of the miſchief intended againſt Cyrus by his Grand-father, doth confeſs, That the line of the Achæmenidæ was ſo renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his proſperity, did thence derive himſelf, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they been ignoble, or had they been the vaſſals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this ſort Xerxes in the ſeventh of Herodotus deriveth himſelf;

Cambyſes.	Ariaramnes.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Arſamnes.	Xerxes.

Of the Achæmenidæ there were two races: of the firſt was Cyrus the great, whoſe iſſue-male failed in his two Sons, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This royal family is thus ſet down by the learned Reineccius.

Achæmenes, the Son of Perſes, firſt King of Perſia.

Darius.

Cyrus, the firſt of that name, had Cambyſes, and Atoſſa, who, married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artiſtona and other Daughters.

Cambyſes had

Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had

Cambyſes, who ſucceeded him, and Smerdis, ſlain by his Brother Cambyſes.

Of the ſecond, were thoſe ſeven great Princes of Perſia, who having overthrown the uſurped Royalty of the Magi, choſe from among themſelves Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes, King.

This Kingdom of Perſia was firſt known by the name of Elam, ſo called after Elam the Son of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamitæ; by Elianus, Elymæ; by Joſephus, Elymi.

Suidas derives this Nation ſometimes from Aſſur, ſometimes from Magog, of whom they were called Maguſæi; which Maguſæi, according to Euſebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in general, but for thoſe that were afterward called the Magi, or Wiſemen. So do the Greeks, among many other their ſayings of them, affirm, That the Perſians were anciently written Ariæi, and that they called themſelves Cephenes. But that that they were Elamitæ, Moses and the Prophets, Esay, Jeremy, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Esdras, in many places confirm: Which also St. Hierom upon Jeremy the five and twentieth, upon Daniel the eighth, and also in his Hebrew questions, approveth, saying: Elam à quo Elamitæ Principes Persidis; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Persia.

And that City which the Author of the second Book of the Maccabees calleth Persepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elamais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted, in vain, and to his great dishonour. And yet this City, now called Siras, was not the old Persepolis; for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to us known, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the fourteenth Chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who lived with Amrafel or Ninias, and joyned with him in the war against those Arabians, who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his Name, and first actions.

Strab. l. 15.

AS touching the Name of Cyrus Strabo saith, That the same was taken from a River which watereth Persia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper Name: But the great Cyrus was the first of that Name. Herodotus, otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a Father in the Persian-Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people.

Plut. in vit. Artax.

It is true, that for his Justice and other excellent virtues he was indeed called a Father: But that the Name of Cyrus had any such signification, I think it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sun, in the same Language. Howsoever it be, yet the Prophet Esay, almost two hundred years before Cyrus was born, gives him that Name, Thus saith the Lord unto Cyrus his Annointed, &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which the Conquest of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto subject, together with the taking of Crœsus himself, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter atchievements: whose opinion for his difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in the last war against Crœsus; and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; and the glorious victory which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have been used (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having won Babylon it self, which in due place I have answered. The latter seems to have reference to the second War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; as which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to believe with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and find the enterprize of Sardis to preceed that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Crœsus the King of Lydia, who made war upon Cyrus.

I Have in the last Book spoke somewhat of Crœsus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors known) was Lydus the Son of Atys: which Family extinguished, the Kingdom was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twenty Generations; Candaules being the last, who by shewing his fair wife naked to Gyges his favourite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto urged urged upon peril of his own life by the Queen) the next day ſlain. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdom of Lydia, and left the ſame to Atys his Son, who was Father to Sadyattes, the Father of Halyattes (who thruſt the Cimmerians out of Aſia) and Halyattes begat Crœſus. Which five Kings, of a third race, enjoyed that Kingdom an hundred and ſeventy years. Halyattes the Father of Crœſus was an undertaking Prince, and after he had continued a War againſt Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it ſix years, a peace was concluded upon equal conditions between them.

Herod. l. 1. p. 3, 4, & 5.

Aſtyages the Son of Cyaxares, and Grandfather to Cyrus, thought himſelf greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenes, Crœſus Siſter, whom he married.

But Crœſus ſo far enlarged his Dominions after his Fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were four in effect of equal ſtrength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonoſor, after he had joyned Phœnicia, Paleſtina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no Competitor during his own life.

But Crœſus, notwithſtanding the men and treaſure ſpent in the quarrel of the Babylonians, he yet maſtered Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces poſſeſt by the Greeks in Aſia the leſs, adjoyning to Lydia; gave Law to the Phrygians, Bithinians, Carians, Myſians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he alſo inforc'd the Epheſians to acknowledge him, notwithſtanding they compaſſed their City with Diana's Girdle, Herodotus witneſſeth. Moreover, Athenæus out of Berojus (which alſo confirmeth) makes report of a Signal Victory, which Crœſus obtained againſt the Sacæans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feaſt, which they called Sacæa: All which he performed in fourteen years.

Her. l. 5. Athe. l. 14. c. 17.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus fame, doubting alſo that his proſperous undertakings might in the end grow perilous to himſelf, he conſulted with the Oracle of Apollo (whom he preſented with marvellous rich gifts) what ſucceſs he might hope for againſt Cyrus, if he undertook him: from whom he received this riddle; Crœſus paſſing over the River Halys, ſhall diſſolve a great Dominion. For the Devil being doubtful of the ſucceſs, payed him with merchandize of both ſide alike, and might be inverted either way; to the ruin of Perſia, or of his own Lydia.

§. III.

Crœſus his Expedition againſt Cyrus.

HEreupon Crœſus being reſolved to ſtop the courſe of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, deſpiſed all the arguments uſed by Sandanes to the contrary, who deſired him to fore-think, That he urged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region; a people not covered with the ſoft ſilk of Worms, but with the hard skins of Beaſts; not fed with ſuch meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of Water, not of Wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and proſperous; over whom, if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himſelf in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and ſubjected, ſo great would his loſs appear of all things which the world hath in account, as the ſame could neither haſtily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithſtanding this ſolid counſel, Crœſus having prepared a powerful Army, he led the ſame toward Media, but in his paſſage he was arreſted at Pterium, a City of great ſtrength in Cappadocia; which while he ſought by all means to ſurprize or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferiour to other in ſtrength or opinion, I do not find: for, out of doubt, Crœſus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; ſo was he not under any in territory and fame that then lived.

But, as Cratippus of Mitylene anſwered Pompey when he complained againſt the gods, becauſe they favoured a diſturber and uſurper of the Common-weal againſt him who fought for the Roman liberty, That Kingdoms and Common-weals had their encreaſe and period from divine Ordinance: ſo, at this time was the Winter of Crœſus proſperity at hand, the leaves of his flouriſhing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and firſt ſpring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When theſe two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers skirmiſhes, the Perſians and Lydians began to joyn in groſs troops: ſupplies from both Kings thruſt on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nations: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the dark vail of night had hidden each Army from the others view, Crœsus doubting what success the rising Sun would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retired, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first City and Regal Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other War for that Winter, he dismissed the Souldiers, and sent the troops of his sundry Nations to their own Provinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five months, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the War at the time appointed.

§. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

CYrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Army in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heels, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Crœsus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Crœsus had disposed his Army to their wintring garrisons; which being altogether unlooked for, and unfeared, he surrounded Sardis with his Army; Wherein Crœsus having no other Companies than his Citizens and Ordinary Guards, after fourteen dayes siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Crœsus having now neither Arms to fight, nor wings to fly, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himself into the heap and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a son of his, who had been dumb all his life (by extremity of passion and fear enabled) cryed out to the Souldiers to spare Crœsus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoiled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heap of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembring the discourse which he had with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that invocation, he first used silence; but urged again, he told them, That he had now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courses of their lives might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himself for happy indeed, till his end.

In communi calamitate suam quisque habet fortunam, Curt. Memoriam metus perimit: timor, vocis est incitamentum, &c. Solin. c. 7.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of fortune, and his own mortality, he commanded his Ministers of Justice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to save Crœsus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? or what self-reason had conducted him to invade his territory, and to make him of a Friend an Enemy? To whom he thus answered; It was thy prosperous, and my unprosperous destiny (the Grecian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inventers and conductors of Crœsus War against Cyrus.

Homo qui in homine calamitoso misericors est, meminit hui, cass.

Cyrus being pierc't with Crœsus answer, and bewailing his estate, though victorious over it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him ever after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Quæ non causam, sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the real difference discerned between that behaviour which we call beneficium latronis, and gratiam Principis: A thief sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but unjustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his own evil.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrus did friendly entertain Crœsus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus delivers, and is here already set down, that he should have been burnt alive. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroical Prince, thought an intent so cruel, fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much mis-beseeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neerness of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he been otherwise vicious) from so cruel a purpose against his Grandmothers brother. Howsoever it was, the moral part of the Story hath given much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it pass for currant, though the trust reposed in Crœsus afterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not use him inhumanly at the first.

For, as Herodotus himself telleth us, when Cyrus past with his Army over Araxes into Scythia, he left Crœsus to accompany and advise his son Cambyses, Governour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of Cyrus, and did afterward follow low Cambyſes into Egypt, where he hardly eſcaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I do not find.

But in this time the races of three of the greateſt Kings in that part of the World took end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthaſar, Cyaxares, and Cræſus.

§. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

AFter this Lydian War, enſued the great Conqueſt of Babylon, which gave unto Cyrus an Empire ſo large and mighty, that he was juſtly reputed the greateſt Monarch then living upon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action took up, it is uncertain; only it ſeems, that ten whole years did paſs between his taking thoſe two Cities of Sardis and Babylon; which nevertheleſs I do not think to have been wholly occupyed in proviſion for the Aſſyrian war, but rather to have been ſpent in ſettling the Eſtate which he had already purchaſed. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Cteſias hath in his fragments, of a war made by Cyrus upon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained againſt Cræſus. He telleth us, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious over that Nation, took Amorges their King priſoner: but being in a ſecond battel overthrown by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was delivered for the other.

Likewiſe it may be thought that no ſmall part of thoſe troubles which aroſe in the lower Aſia, grew ſoon after the departure of the victorious Army, before the Conqueſt was fully eſtabliſhed.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Aſia the leſs, many Nations, conquered formerly by Cræſus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; againſt whom he employed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who firſt reduced the Phocians under their former obedience, and then the reſt of the Greeks inhabiting Aſia the leſs, as the Ionians, Carians, Æolians, and Lycians, who reſolvedly (according to the ſtrength they had) defended themſelves. But in the attempt upon Babylon it ſelf, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing ſhould be able to divert him, or to raiſe that ſiege, and make fruſtrate the work upon which he did ſet all his reſt. And great reaſon there was, that he ſhould bend all his care and ſtrength unto the taking of that City, which beſide the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was ſo ſtrongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and ſurrounded with waters unfoordable, ſo plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their eſtate, but deſpiſed and derided all purpoſes and power of their beſiegers.

The only hope of the Medes and Perſians, who deſpaired of carrying by aſſault a City ſo well fortified and man'd, was, in cutting off all ſupplies of victuals and other neceſſaries: whereof though the Town was ſaid to be ſtored ſufficiently for more than twenty years, yet might it well be deemed, that in ſuch a world of people as dwelt within thoſe gates, one great want or other would ſoon appear, and vanquiſh the reſolution of that unwarlike multitude. In expecting the ſucceſs of this courſe, the Beſiegers were likely to endure much travel, and all in vain, if they did not keep ſtreight watch and ſtrong guards upon all quarters.

This was hard to do, in regard of the vaſt circuit of thoſe walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men ſufficiently aſſured unto their Commander: The conſideration whereof miniſtred unto the Babylonians matter of good paſtime, when they ſaw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who having been their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to joyn with them, if occaſion were offered than to uſe much diligence on the behalf of Cyrus; who had, as it were yeſterday, laid upon their necks the galling yoak of ſervitude. Whileſt the beſieged were pleaſing themſelves in this deceitful and vain gladneſs, that is the ordinary fore-runner of ſudden calamity, Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made ſtrong, conſtant, and inventive, deviſed, by ſo many channels and trenches as were ſufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the ſame from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and aſſured: which when by the labour of many hands he had performed, he ſtayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for he had left certain banks or heads un-cut, between the main river which ſurrounded the City, and his own Trenches. Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 7.

Now Balthaſar, finding neither any want or weakneſs within, nor any poſſibility of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding ſumptuous Feaſt, publick Playes, and other Paſtimes; and thereto invited a thouſand of his Princes or Nobility, beſides his Wives, Curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the beſiegers know, that his proviſions were either ſufficient, not only for all needfull uſes, but even for jollity and exceſs; or becauſe he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many diſtreſſes, were well near broken; or in honour of Bell his moſt reverenced Idol; or that it was his Birth or Coronation-day; or for many or all theſe reſpects. And he was not contented with ſuch magnificence as no Prince elſe could equal, but (uſing Daniel's words) he lifted himſelf up againſt the Lord of Heaven: for he and his Princes, Wives and Concubines, made carouſing cups of the veſſels of Gold, in contempt of whom, he praiſed his own Puppets, made of Silver and Gold, of Braſs, Iron, Wood, and Stone; Quanta fuit ſtultitia in vaſibus aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos deos laudare? How great a fooliſhneſs was it (ſaith St. Hierom) drinking in golden Cups, to praiſe gods of Wood and Stone? While Balthaſar was in this ſort triumphing, and his brains well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall oppoſite unto him, certain words which he underſtood not: wherewith ſo great a fear and amazement ſeiſed him, as the joynts of his loyns were looſed, and his knees ſmote one againſt the other. Which paſſion, when he had in ſome part recovered, he cried out for his Chaldæans, Aſtrologians, and Southſayers, promiſing them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdom to him that could read and expound the writing: but it exceeded their Art. In this diſturbance and aſtoniſhment, the Queen hearing what had paſt, and of the Kings amazement, after reverence done, uſed this ſpeech: There is a man in thy Kingdom, in whom is the ſpirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy Father, light, and underſtanding, and wiſdom, like the wiſdom of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonoſor, thy Father, the King (I ſay) thy Father made chief of the Inchanters, Aſtrologians, Chaldæans, and Southſayers, becauſe a more excellent ſpirit, and knowledge, and underſtanding, &c. were found in him, even in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

Dan. 5. 6.

This Queen, Joſephus takes for the Grandmother; Origen and Theodoret, for the Mother of Balthaſar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that ſhe was not any of the Kings Wives, becauſe abſent from the feaſt; and being paſt the age of dancing and banquetting, ſhe came in upon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his diſtraction. And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger years and times, this old Queen remembred well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonoſor, Grandfather to this Balthaſar, and kept in mind both his Religion and divine gifts.

Orig. & Theod. in Dan. Joſeph. Ant. 10.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings preſence, who acknowledged thoſe excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promiſes of reward and honour, to read and interpret thoſe words miraculouſly written; to whom Daniel made anſwer in a far different ſtyle from that he uſed towards his Grandfather: for, the evil which he foretold Nabuchodonoſor, he wiſhed that the ſame might befall his enemies; but to this King (whoſe neglect of God, and vice, he hated) he anſwered in theſe words, Keep thy rewards to thy ſelf, and give thy gifts to another; yet will I read the writing unto the King, and ſhew him the interpretation. Which, before he had performed, he gave him firſt the cauſe of Gods juſt judgement againſt him, and the reaſon of this terrible ſentence, whereof the King and all his Wiſe men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodneſs to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of thoſe benefits, as he deprived him of his eſtate and underſtanding, ſo upon the acknowledgment of Gods infinite power he reſtored him to both. This King, notwithſtanding, liſted himſelf up againſt the ſame God; and preſuming both to abuſe thoſe Veſſels dedicated to holy uſes, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praiſed and worſhipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Braſs, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore thoſe words, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Upharſin, gave the King knowledge, that God hath numbred the time of his Kingdom, and finiſhed it; That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods Juſtice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Perſians. Dan. 5. 18, 19, 20.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthaſar feaſted and periſhed, Cyrus, either by his eſpials, according to Xenophon; or inſpired by God himſelf, whoſe enſign he followed in this War, found the time and opportunity to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobility were no leſs filled with the vapors of Wine, than their hearts with the fear of Gods judgment, he cauſed all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the preſent, by whoſe channel running, his Army made their entrance, finding none to diſturb them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet ſaith) in ſleep and wine: ſuch as came in the Perſians way, were put to the ſword, unleſs they ſaved themſelves by flight, as ſome did, who ran away crying, and filling the ſtreets with an uncertain tumult.

Such Aſſyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthaſar, and betaken themſelves to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a ſelected company to the Kings Palace; which having eaſily forced, they ruſhed into the Chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, ſlew both him and them without any mercy, who ſtruggled in vain to keep thoſe lives which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the Prophecy of Jeremy fulfilled, and that of Eſay two hundred years before this ſubverſion; who in his ſeven and fortieth Chapter, and elſewhere, writeth this deſtruction ſo feelingly and lively, as if he had been preſent both at the terrible ſlaughter there committed, and had ſeen the great and unfeared change and calamity of this great Empire; yea, and had alſo heard the ſorrows and bewailings of every ſurviving ſoul thereunto ſubject. His Prophecy of this place he beginneth in theſe words; Come down, and ſit in the duſt, O Virgin Daughter of Babel: ſit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And again, Sit ſtill, and get thee into darkneſs, O daughter of the Chaldæans; for thou ſhalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdoms. For, though it cannot be doubted, that God uſed Nabuchodonoſor, and the Chaldæans, to puniſh the Idolatry of the Judæans; yet Eſay teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his judgments was mixt with a rigorous extremity. For (ſaith Eſay) in the perſon of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didſt ſhew them no mercy, but thou didſt lay thy very heavy yoke upon the ancient. I will riſe up againſt them, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts, and will cut off from Babel the Name, and the Remnant, and the Son, and the Nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, ſhall be ſtricken thorow: whoſoever joyneth himſelf, ſhall fall by the ſword, their children alſo ſhall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houſes ſpoiled, and their Wives raviſhed. So as there is no Hiſtorian who was either preſent at this victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the ſame to poſterity after it happened, than Eſay hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attempted.

Cap. 47.

Iſa. 14. To wit, Evilmerodach and Balthaſar.

The greatneſs and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors ſet down, might ſeem altogether fabulous: for, beſides the reports of Saint Hierom, Solinus, and Oroſius, Ariſtotle in the third of his Politicks, the ſecond Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the City knew not that the reſt was taken three dayes after. Which is not impoſſible, if the teſtimony of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compaſs therof at three hundred and threeſcore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and forty miles: the walls whereof had ſo great a breadth, that ſix Chariots might paſs in front thereon. And of height, according to Cteſias and Clitracus, three hundred threeſcore and five foot, garniſhed with an hundred and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his ſixteenth Book of Geography, gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty Furlongs more to the former compaſs, reckoning the ſame at three hundred fourſcore and five Furlongs, which make eight and forty mile and one Furlong, but finds the wall far under that which Diodore reports: and ſo doth Curtius meaſure their thickneſs but at two and thirty foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is alſo very much; every cubit containing a foot and a half of the large meaſure, though to the whole circuit of the City he gives the ſame with Siculus, and eight Furlongs more. Herodotus finds a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, four hundred and fourſcore furlongs circle; the thickneſs of the wall he meaſures at fifty cubits, and the height at two hundred of the ſame regal cubit. For entrance, it had an hundred Gates of Braſs, with poſts and Hooks to hang them on of the ſame metal: and therefore did the Prophet Eſay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princeſs and Glory of Kingdoms.

But when Cyrus had won her, he ſtript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a ſlave; dividing not only all her goodly houſes, and her whole Territory, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but beſtowing the inhabitants themſelves as bond-ſlaves upon thoſe that had taken poſſeſſion of their goods.

Touching the reign of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in reſt and pleaſure, I can ſay no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have lasted only seven years: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royal power to themselves and their posterity.

§. VI.

The End of Cyrus.

THe last War, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Justin deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the less, Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queen: and that in an incounter between the Persians and these Northern Nomades, Tomyris lost her Army, and her Son Spargapises that commanded it: In revenge whereof, this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Cyrus, in a second battel beat the Persian Army, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a bowl of blood, using these words; Thou that hast all thy life time thirsted for blood, now drink thy fill, and satiate thy self.

It should hereby seem, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their fury by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares Father to Astyages, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the less, and held the same in a servile subjection eight and twenty years.

This War, which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith he) six years, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I believe with Vigenier, that this Scythian War was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliver the success of that War otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Viginier) because Strabo in his eleventh Book reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Justin saith, he defeated the Son of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last War which Cyrus made, was against Amorrhæus King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three dayes after.

Vig. prim. part. Bib.

Cte. l. 15. hist. part.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his own City of Pasagardes, which himself had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is said to have been this: O vir, quicunque es, & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terræ quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne invideas; O thou man, whosoever thou art, or whencesoever thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldst come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, do not envy unto me this little earth, with which my body is covered.

Strab. l. 15.

This Tomb was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have been buried with him (or upon desire to honour his dead body with certain ceremonies) in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bows, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his own garment, and a Crown of Gold to be set upon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris.

Qu. Curt.

Xen. pæd. 8. Zon. l. 1. c. 20.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Army of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his Son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so far off from that quarter; the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media: neither had Cambyses been able in such haste to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged, and in peace: and that finding in himself, that he could not long enjoy the world, he called unto him his Nobility, with his two Sons, Cambyses and Smerdis; or, after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and, after a long Oration, wherein he assured himself, and taught others, of the immortality of the Soul, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every man in this life; he exhorted his Sons by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetual concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himself had read the Prophecy of Esay, wherein he was expresly named, and by God (for the delivery of his people) preordained. Which act of delivering the Jews from their Captivity, and of restoring the holy Temple and City of Jerusalem, was in true consideration the noblest work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other other actions he was an inſtrument of Gods power, uſed for the chaſtiſing of many Nations, and the eſtabliſhing of a Government in thoſe parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the Grace to be an inſtrument of Gods goodneſs, and a willing advancer of his Kingdom upon Earth; which muſt laſt for ever, though heaven and earth ſhall periſh.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Jeruſalem.

HAving therefore ſpoken of his great Victories, mentioned by ſundry Hiſtorians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his ſervice done unto him that was Authour of them and of all goodneſs: I hold it meet at length to ſpeak of the Decree made in the firſt of his Reign, being perhaps the firſt that ever he made after his poſſeſſion of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jews ſhould return again into their own Territory, and re-build the Houſe of God in Jeruſalem, having now endured and finiſhed the threeſcore and ten years captivity, by the Prophets foretold. For the accompliſhing whereof, he gave order to his Treaſurers to furniſh them with all things neceſſary and wanting. He alſo reſtored unto them five thouſand four hundred threeſcore and nine Veſſels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonoſor, the Grandfather of Balthaſar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jews which returned out of Chaldæa under their Leader Zorobabel, the Son of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Jeconias, and Jeſus or Joſua the ſon of Joſadak, were about fifty thouſand; where, as ſoon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and ſacrificed thereon, according to their own Law, and afterward bethought themſelves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no ſooner did the Jews begin to lay any one ſtone, than the Samaritans and other Idolatrous Nations adjoyning, gave all the impediment they could. So did the Governours of thoſe Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the diſturbers, and in no ſort favoured the Jews, nor the labours nor purpoſes they had in hand. And not only thoſe which were but Provincial Lieutenants, and other officers of leſs place, but Cambyſes himſelf; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was buſied otherwiſe, countermanded the building begun. And whereas ſome Authours make doubt, that whatſoever Cambyſes did when himſelf had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no ſuch impediment or prohibition: they may herein reſolve themſelves out of Eſdras, That by the conſpiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindred all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, what the Jews themſelves affirm, as it is written in the ſecond of John, That the Temple was 46. years in ſetting up, having received ſo many hinderances from the firſt foundation to the ſecond of Darius.

1 Eſd. 2.16.
1 Eſd. 5. 33.
1 Eſd. 4.5.

And if we ſeek the natural and politick courſes which moved Cambyſes to withſtand his Fathers Decree, as well while he Governed under him, as when himſelf became ſole and Soveraign Monarch, we ſhall finde them in that Epiſtle remembred by Eſdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the reſt, Preſidents and Counſellors in Phœnicia, wherein they complain that the Jews were evermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their City being once built, they would then refuſe to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

Eſd. 1.c. 4.

But that which for that preſent ſeemed the moſt forcible impediment, was, that Cambyſes having in his reſolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jews were deſcended of thoſe Nations, becauſe they iſſued thence under Moſes, when they conquered Judæa; their City being once repaired and fortified, they might return to their old vomit, and give the ſame diſturbance to Cambyſes Conqueſt, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonoſor, and other Kings of Babylon. For, as it is written in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the houſe of Iſrael.

*Ezek.*c.29.

But it is to be underſtood, as Codoman and others have obſerved, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counſellors and Governors of Phœnicia complained againſt the Jews, did not precede, but ſucceed Darius Hyſtaſpes, as in the ſixth and ſeventh Chapters of Eſdras it is made plain: and alſo that thoſe Governors (whoſe Epiſtle ſheweth as much) did not withſtand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and encloſing of the City, as by the reaſons given in the ſaid Epiſtle, and by the Kings anſwer, it is evident.

Alſo in the ſixth of Ezra, the fourteenth verſe, the Kings are named in order as they Governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finiſhed it (to wit the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Iſrael, and by the commandement of Cyrus and and Darius, and Artahshaste Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seventh of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the reign of Artahshaste King of Persia: which was as much as to say, after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdras is there named by anticipation, not in his own time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the City and Temple of Hierusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other Ordinances of Cyrus, with his form and manner of Government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire unto his eldest Son Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his younger son to be Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Caduſia; and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one and thirty years, or (according to Justine) but thirty.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his Issue: and whether Atossa were his Daughter, or (as some think) were the same with Queen Hester.

CYrus had issue two sons, Cambyses and Smendis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyses married; Artystona, Darius Hystaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead: who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be avenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Aman (whom the old Translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Jews, though the opinion of Josephus be more probable, who finds Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be understood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should have been Esther, whose History seems rather to appertain to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the son of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded upon the honour which thereby she thought her husband might obtain, partly upon a feminine humour of getting many brave Dames, Corinthians; Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give assent to the opinion of Codoman, who upon the near sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa, (by the latter of which Esther was also called) makes them to have been one person. For though it be true that Esther concerning her parentage, a while might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certain it is, that Esther did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby, if Histories could be kept free from this errour, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs have understood the truth: who nevertheless did so well know the parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her son Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdom before his elder brother, against whom also he could have pretended a very weak claim. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The Estate of things from the Death of Cyrus to the Reign of Darius.

§. I.

Of the Number and Names of the Persian Kings.

OF the Successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbred the Persian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus joyntly.	2

To which Philo agreeth; which number of years added, make in all an hundred ninety and one. But in this Catalogue Metaſthenes hath left out Cambyſes and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Aſſuerus, for the immediate ſucceſſor of Cyrus; in place (ſaith Melanchon) of Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes: for Metaſthenes, as Melanchon conjectureth, doth not account Cambyſes in the Catalogue, becauſe his reign was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a ſecond Opinion, though ridiculous, of Sedar Olam, who finds but four Perſian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus, have alſo a differing account from the Greeks; whom nevertheleſs Euſebius, and moſt of the Latins follow, and ſo doth Krentzheim, who hath fully anſwered; and, as I take it, refuſed all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this ſort do the Greeks marſhal the Perſian Kings with the times of their reigns.

Melanct. 4.	Arſames.	3
	Darius the laſt.	6

Which numbers put together, make in all two hundred and thirty.

This account (as I have ſaid) the moſt Chronologers, and the beſt learned approve. Theſe Perſian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his hiſtorical Animadverſions, hath gathered the places; finding firſt Cyrus in the ſecond of Chronicles, ch. 36. verſ. 22, 23. Ezra 1. ch. 1. verſ. 1. and often elſewhere.

Secondly, Cambyſes in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well eſteemed for one of thoſe three Kings in the ſecond verſe named, and ſo the Marginal Commentator upon the Geneva underſtands that place; but, under correction, miſtakes the matter greatly, when he ſaith in the ſame note, that Darius Hyſtaſpes was an enemy to the people of God, and ſtood againſt them: his great favour and liberality to the Jews being elſewhere proved.

Thirdly, Is Darius Hyſtaſpes found in Ezra the firſt, c. 4. v. 5. who in the ſixth verſe is alſo named Ahaſſuerus.

Fourthly, In the eleventh of Daniel, verſe the ſecond, Xerxes is plainly foretold and deſcribed, and the great War which he ſhould make againſt the Greeks by Daniel remembered.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verſe ſeven, who is alſo called Arthaſaſtha, c. 4. l. 1. Ezra v. 7. and chap. 7. v. 7.

Sixthly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. v. 24: and cap. 5. v. 6. Nehem. cap. 12. v. 22.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. cap. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arſames: for Darius the laſt, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who deſcended from Xerxes the ſon of Atoſſa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the iſſue male of Cyrus failing with his own Sons.

But to proceed, Euſebius, with the Latins following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Perſian King with their Acts, to ſome certain Olympiad; As the War of Aſtyages (Cyrus his maternal Grandfather) and Alyattes (Cræſus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reign, to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The invaſion of Egypt by Cambyſes to the third year of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and ſo of the reſt. Which reference with good agreement between ſeveral forms of computation, add the more credit unto both.

Again, this hiſtorical demonſtration is confirmed by the Aſtronomical computation of Ptolemy, who referrs the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and four and twentieth year after Nabonaſſar. And the Æra of Nabonaſſar began on the ſix and twentieth of February: which, conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth month of the firſt year of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as do the Greek Hiſtorians, or that of Nabonaſſar with Ptolemy, we ſhall find every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

Alm. l. 3. cap. 6.

For Ptolemy reckons the time anſwerable to two hundred and four and twenty Julian years, and an hundred and forty daies from Nabonaſſar to the ſixteenth of July, in the seventh year of Cambyses.

The Greeks, and namely, Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyses in the second or third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyses seventh year, in the first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolomy the two hundred and six and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars Æra and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty years) agrees with the third of the threescore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greeks. In this Josephus agrees with the Greeks throughout, saving that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greek computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, The disagreement and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearsed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greeks, which being constant in it self, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyses, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WE will therefore, according to the truth, give the Empire of Persia to Cambyses, the Son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, saving the desire to increase the greatness of his Empire: whereof he was possest in his Fathers time, while Cyrus made war in the North. Ctesias with others give him a longer reign than agreeth with the Græcian accompt before received.

Lib. 2. c. 2. Her. l. 3. pag. 83, 84, 85. In the fifth year of his sole reign, and in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrown the King thereof, Psammeniticus, he not only caused him to be slain, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias give for cause of this War (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis King of Egypt, to have his Daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the Daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyses disdained.

Howsoever it were; true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Army fit for such an enterprize, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasis died, and left Psammeniticus, whom Ctesias called Amyrteus, his successor; who enjoyed Egypt after his Father (according to the best Copies of Herodotus) but six moneths, though other Chronologers give him six years.

But how long soever he held the Crown, in one battle he lost it, and was himself taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyses, following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the Government of Egypt, and that, upon some revolt, or suspicion thereof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if we may believe Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Son called Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammeniticus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrival, that he caused his body to be drawn out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custom both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians used to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the worms might not devour them. The * Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Romans ever consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who caused his own to be devoured by that element, fearing the Law called Talionis, or like for like, because himself had untombed the carcase of Cajus Marius after his death. Her. l. 3. Plin. l. 6. c. 54. Stra. & Just. l. 1. Pag. 87, 88. Her. l. 3. Sen. l. 7.

§. III.

The rest of Cambyses his Acts.

AFter this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyses sent an Army into Cyprus, and constrained Evelthon King thereof to acknowledge him who before held that Island of the Egyptians.

While Cambyses yet busied himself in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that that Nation, as he cauſed the Images themſelves, with the Temples wherein they were worſhipped, to be torn down and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Army into Lybia, to overturn the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Devil, in defence of his Oratory, raiſed ſuch a Tempeſt of Sand, wherewith the greateſt part of the Country is covered, as the Perſians were therewith choaked and over-whelmed.

Notwithſtanding which miſadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that, diſdaining to be reſiſted, he prepared the reſt of his Army, which himſelf meant to conduct into thoſe parts, but that finding a beginning of thoſe incommodities, which his firſt-ſent troops had tryed, he changed his purpoſe. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the Elements do not obey them; according to that old Engliſh Proverb, Go, ſaith the King; Stay, ſaith the Tide.

After his return from the attempt of Æthiopia, he cauſed Apis the Egyptian Bull, worſhipped by that Nation as God, to be ſlain: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeal, and been executed as in ſervice of him that only is, and liveth. But ſoon afterwards, when in a dream it ſeemed unto him that Smerdis did ſit in the Royal Throne of Perſia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave it in charge to his favourite Praxaſpes, to murther Smerdis his Brother. And having married his own Siſters, contrary to the Perſian Laws, he committed a moſt cauſeleſs and moſt deteſtable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himſelf with child, becauſe ſhe bewailed the death of her Brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Cambyſes. That becauſe his Predeceſſors obſerved religiouſly the Ordinances of their Empire, he aſſembled his Judges and enquired of them, whether there were any Law among the Perſians that did permit the Brother to marry his own Siſter; it being his own intent ſo to do: The Judges (who had alwayes either Laws or diſtinctions in ſtore to ſatisfie Kings and times) made anſwer, That there was not any thing written allowing any ſuch conjunction, but they notwithſtanding found it in their cuſtoms, that it was alwayes left to the will of the Perſian Kings, to do what beſt pleaſed themſelves; and ſo, as Nauclerus terms it, invenerunt occaſionem: that is as much to ſay, The Judges found a ſhift to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings private ſatisfaction, he cauſed Siſamnus, one of his Judges, and perchance one of thoſe which favoured his inceſtuous match, to be flayed alive, for an unjuſt judgement given, and the ſame his hide to be hung up over the judgement-ſeat. After which, beſtowing the Fathers Office on his Son, he willed him to remember that the ſame partiality deſerved the ſame puniſhment.

Her. p. 89, 90.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exerciſed againſt the Son of his beloved Praxaſpes, was very ſtrange and ungrateful. For when he deſired to be truly informed by him what the Perſians thought of his conditions, Praxaſpes anſwered, That his virtues were followed with abundant praiſe from all men; only it was by many obſerved, that he took more than uſual delight in the taſt of Wine: with which taxation inflamed, he uſed this replication: And, Are the Perſians double-tongued, who alſo tell me, that I have in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? Thou Praxaſpes ſhalt then witneſs, whether in this report they have done me right: for, if at the firſt ſhot I pierce thy Sons heart with an Arrow, then is it falſe that hath been ſpoken; but if I miſs the mark, I am then pleaſed that the ſame be accounted true, and my ſubjects believed. This being ſpoken, he immediately directed an Arrow towards the innocent child, who falling down dead with the ſtroak, Cambyſes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broached on the Arrow, this monſtrous Tyrant greatly rejoycing, ſhewed it to the Father, with this ſaying inſtead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaſpes, thou mayeſt reſolve thy ſelf, that I have not loſt my wits with Wine, but the Perſians theirs, who make ſuch report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exerciſed, till at the laſt, according to the phraſe of our Law, he became felon de ſoy. For when he was informed, that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanis and Cimerdius) Miniſters of his domeſtical affairs, taking advantage of the great reſemblance between Smerdis the Kings Brother, and Smerdis the Magus, poſſeſt themſelves of the Empire, he made all haſte towards Perſia; and in mounting haſtily on horſe-back, his ſword diſ-ſheathing, pierced his own thigh, wherewith deadly wounded, falling into an over-late and remedileſs repentance of the ſlaughter which he had executed upon his own Brother, he ſoon after gave up his wicked ghoſt, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein thoſe ſeven months in which the Magi governed, while he was abſent.

In Cambyſes the Male-Line of Cyrus failed. For he had no iſſue either by Atoſſa or Zon. Com. 2. p. 117. Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierom gives him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a Son called Orontes: who being drowned in the River Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward, in memory of the Princes death, called Orontes.

He built the City of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Lutopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nilus, calling it by the name of his Sister Meroe.

§. IV.

Of the Inter-regnum between Cambyses and Darius.

CYrus and his two Sons being now dead, and the Kingdom in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfeit of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapa's, or Provincial Governors of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabysus, Aspbatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achæmenes the first Persian King) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joyned their forces together, surprized and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions and Assistants. In which action (saith Justin) Intaphernes and Aspbatines were slain: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were only wounded; for he avoweth, that all the seven Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into a consultation how the same might be ordered from thenceforth. Otanes (one of the Seven) did not fancy any election of Kings, but that the Nobility and Cities should confederate, and by just Laws defend their Libertie in equality, giving divers reasons for his Opinion, being, as it seemed, greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyses: As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatness it self, even in good men, doth often infect the mind with many vices, and that liberty and freedom in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that Tyrants do commonly use the service of wicked men, and favour them most; they usurp upon the Laws of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without judgement.

Megabysus was of another Opinion, affirming that the tyranny of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of One. For the multitude do all things without judgement, run into business and affairs with precipitation, like raging and over-bearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

Darius gave the third judgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among few diuturnity of concord is seldom found, and in great Empires it doth ever happen that the discord of many Rulers hath enforc'd the election of One Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, far safer to observe the Laws of our Country, by which Kingly Government hath been ordained.

The other four Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperial Government, by God established and made prosperous. And, to avoid partiality it was accorded, that the morning following these seven Princes should mount on Horse-back, and on him the Kingdom should be conferred, whose Horse, after the Sun-rising, should first ney or bray. In the even- Her. 3. p. 100, 101. ing, after this appointment was made, it is said, that Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Oebarus, who, in the Suburbs of the City, where the election was resolved of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who, as soon as he came into the same place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other six princes descended from their Horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Laws affirmeth, that in memory of the seven Princes, whereof Darius himself was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into seven Governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

§. I.

Of Darius his Linage,

Darius was deſcended of the antient Perſian Kings, to wit, of the Achæmenidæ, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineal ſucceſſor. For in this ſort Herodotus derives him as before;

Cyrus the firſt, who had Teiſpius, who begat
Ariaramnes, who was father of Arſamnes, the father of Hyſtaſpes, the father of Darius, ſirnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes.

Curt. l. 4.

Hyſtaſpes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the wars againſt the Scythians: at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dream of his own, cauſed him to be ſent into Perſia; others ſay to be impriſoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Perſian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyſes into Egypt; he then joyned with the reſt of the Princes againſt the Magi, and either by the neying of his horſe, or, as others affirm, by ſtrong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more aſſured to himſelf by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neeces for his wives.

Hyſtaſpes, acording to * Herodotus, had, beſides Darius, theſe three ſons, who were great Commanders in the War which Darius made in Aſia the leſs, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes, and Artabanus, who diſſwaded Xerxes, from the ſecond Grecian war. Hyſtaſpes had alſo a Daughter married to Gobrias the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Army of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius Artoſoſtre, his Coſen german.

Reineccius gives to Hyſtaſpes five ſons, Darius who ſucceeded Cambyſes, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two Daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his Government, and ſuppreſſing the rebellion of Babylon.

Darius deviſed equal laws whereby his Subjects might be Governed, the ſame being formerly promiſed by Cyrus. He gave acceſs to all his Subjects, and behaved himſelf ſo mildly to all men, that many Nations deſired and offered themſelves to become his Vaſſals: Only he laid divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not been accuſtomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourteen thouſand five hundred and threeſcore talents, ſaith Herodotus.

The war which Cambyſes made a far off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magi and the Princes of Perſia, for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to ſhake off the Perſian yoke; whereof Darius being advertiſed, he prepared an Army to recover that City and State revolted. But finding the ſame a difficult work, he uſed the ſervice of Zopyrus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Noſe, and with other wounds yet freſh bleeding, he ſeemed to fly to the Babylonians for ſuccour, to whom he accuſed the cruelty of Darius: who, for having given him advice to give over the ſiege of their City, had in this ſort diſmembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave him that credit, as they truſted him with the diſpoſition and commandment of their greateſt forces: which when Zopyrus had obtained, after ſome ſmall colourable over-throws given to the Perſians upon ſallies, he delivered the City into Darius his hands; who had lyen before it twenty moneths.

§. III.

Of Darius his favour to the Jews in building the Temple.

IN the second year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should go on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the revenues of the Crown. And whereas the Governours of those Provinces which are situate between Euphrates and the Phœnician, and midland Sea (whom Ezra calleth the Captains beyond the River) had hindred the work in Cambyses his time, Darius gave commandement that they should not thence-forth come near unto Jernsalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should withdraw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; With-draw your selves far from them; In our English, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building.

Ezra. c. 6.

He also made a Decree which concerned his own Subjects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should be torn down, and the disturber hanged on the Gallows made of the timber thereof. He also in the same Decree maketh invocation to God; That hath caused his Name to dwell there (to) destroy all Kings and people that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In four years after which Decree (the Jews being really furnished with mony and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first return.

§. IV

Of Darius his Scythian War.

AFter the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose King Justin calleth Lauthinus; and saith, that Darius undertook this war against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to convoy his Army into Scythia, he built a bridge of small Vessels over the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the less) to the Ionians and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to break down the bridge, to the end Darius might not return thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficulty; but the same was resisted by Histiæus Prince of Milet, a City of Ionia, which Nation, being a Colony of the Greeks, Diodorus calleth Traytors to their Country, because they joyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaves, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindful of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as fair an occasion of liberty as could have been desired. For the great Army of Darius entring the desart Country called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posterity, at this day, all horse-men, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grasiers, driving their Heards from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing Towns they had none, but used for Houses the Waggons wherein they carried their wives and children. These Waggons they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Town, removeable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himself, called now the great Chrim, any other City than such as Agora, (as they name it) or town of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himself, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither wayes to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitful trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himself might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies, he began to perceive his own folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face upon a bad game, he sent brave messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make trial of his valour and fortune in plain battle; Or, if he acknowledged himself the weaker, then to yield by fair means, and become his Subject; giving him Earth and Water, which the Persians used to demand as a sign that all was yielded unto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphical answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumb shew Darius interpreting by his own wish, thought that he did yield all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seven Princes, who had slain ſlain the Magi, conſtrued their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Perſians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creep into holes in the earth, for elſe ye ſhall not eſcape our arrows. And this interpretation was ſoon verified by the Scythians themſelves, who aſſailed the Perſian camp, drave the horſe-men into the trenches, and vexed the Army with continual Allarums day and night; were ſo fearleſs of this great Monarch, and ſo little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his ſight, they did not forbear the paſtime of courſing a Hare, which they had ſtarted by chance. By this boldneſs of theirs, Darius was ſo diſcouraged, that he forſook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were ſick and weak behind him, and ſo with all ſpeed marched away towards the River Iſter. He was purſued hardly by the Scythians, who miſt him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perſwaded the Ionians to depart, aſſuring them that the Perſian King ſhould never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hyſtiæus the Mileſian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewiſe fail to meet, when they returned from Iſter to ſeek him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Perſians in Europe, after the Scythian War.

Darius having thus eſcaped out of Scythia, determined the invaſion of Thrace and Macedon, in which War he employed Megabaſus, who maſtered the Pæonians, and tranſplanted them, and poſſeſt Perinthus, Chalcedon, Byzantium, and other places, being alſo ſoon after ſubjected, and added to the Perſian Empire by Otanes, the ſon of Syſamnes, whom Cambyſes had excoriated for falſe judgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria, and [a] Cardia likewiſe taken in from the Perſian, who having now reduced under his obeyſance the beſt part of Thrace, did ſend his Embaſſadors to Amintas King of Macedon adjoyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Soveraignty over that Kingdom. Amintas doubting his own ſtrength, entertained the Embaſſadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a ſolemn and magnificent feaſt; the Perſians greatly deſired that the Macedonian Ladies might be preſent: which being granted, the Embaſſadors, who were well filled with wine, and preſumed upon their greatneſs and many Victories, began to uſe ſuch embracings, and other laſcivous behaviour towards thoſe Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings ſon, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, diſdaining the Perſians barbarous preſumption, beſought his Father to with-draw himſelf from the aſſembly, continuing notwithſtanding all honourable reſpect towards the Embaſſadors, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refreſh themſelves for a while; promiſing their ſpeedy return. This being obtained, Alexander cauſed the like number of well-favoured young men to clothe themſelves in the ſame garments, and to uſe the ſame attires which the Ladies had worn at the feaſt, giving them in charge, That when the Perſians offered to abuſe them, they ſhould forthwith tranſpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpoſe, which was accordingly performed. Charge was ſoon after given by Darius for a ſevere revenge of this murder: But Alexander ſomewhat before the death of Amintas, gave his ſiſter Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principal Commander of Darius forces on that ſide, who perſwading her huſband how helpful the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the invaſion of Attica intended, ſo prevailed, as Alexander eſcaped that tempeſt, which threatned to fall upon him very ſuddenly; the war of Aſia the leſs, called Ionick, falling out at the ſame time.

§. VI.

The firſt occaſion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearſal of the government in Athens, whence the quarrel grew.

NOw the better to underſtand the reaſon and motives of that great War, which followed ſoon after, between the Perſians and Grecians, it is neceſſary to make a ſhort repetition of the ſtate of Athens, which City endured the hardeſt and worſt brunt of Darius invaſion on that ſide the Sea, with admirable ſucceſs. Neither do I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumſtance of ſo great a buſineſs as gave fire to thoſe wars, which never could be throughly quenched, until in the ruin of this great Perſian Monarchy. Perſepolis the Capital City of the Empire, was at the requeſt of an Athenian Harlot conſumed with a flame, as dreadful, as in the pride of their greatneſs, the Perſians had raiſed in Athens.

Now

Now therefore as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens and other parts of Greece, were antiently Governed, the same being already set down, though scatteringly, and in several times, among other the Contemporary occurrents of the Eastern Emperours, and the Kings of Judæa; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember again the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedæmonians, they maintained still their ancient polity under Kings, though these also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former books remembred, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former Government from Monarchial to Princes for term of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontidæ; and of these there were twelve Generations besides Medon, to wit, Solon, and others, who are the less to be regarded, by reason of the yearly change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdom, gave Laws to the Athenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after-ages derived unto the Romans, and by the Decem-viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into Twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Roman Laws. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his own dayes violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed unto the practice and maintenance of a popular Government; the state of Athens was very soon changed into a Monarchy by Pisistratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus, two Citizens of Noble Families, were become the heads, took occasion by their contention and insolency to raise a third faction more powerful than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in General. Having by this means obtained love and credit, he wounded himself, and fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to have been slain for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a Guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadel of Athens, he made himself Lord of the Town; Hegesistratus being then governour. But the Citizens, who in every change of Government had sought to remove themselves further and further from the form of a Monarchy, could so ill brook this usurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driven for lack of help, to fly the Town, as soon as Megacles and Lycurgus (joyning their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his Tyranny, founded upon the dissention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soon soon after well re-edified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did (as is the usual practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gave his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Family of the Alcmæonidæ, whereof Megacles was chief, became very powerful, yet so, that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmæonidæ, and especially Megacles, being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Town, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so far, that Pisistratus (upon the first discovery of their intent) perceived no other remedy for his affairs, than to withdraw himself to Eretria, where he remained eleven years. Which time being expired, having hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he again recovered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he governed Athens seventeen years, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three years, saith Elianus, but, as Justin hath it, four and thirty; accounting the time belike as well before, as after his several expulsions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Son six and thirty years; Aristotle five and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Successors, his two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineal successors of a natural Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and some three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his Brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And, though Hipparchus was charged with unnatural lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent virtues as that Age had any; altogether condemning the murderers, and authors of that scandal. Hippias fearing that this enterprize upon his Brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, first sought to discover the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who, because she would not reveal her Companions, did cut out her own tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himself, enter into a strait amity with Æantides, Tyrant of the City Lampsacus, whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Darius, to whose Son Hypoclus he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three years after the death of his Brother, doubting I know not what strong practice against himself, he began to use the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himself had ever exercised, during their usurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase than diminish in Hippias, they stirred up Clistines, one of the noblest and best able of their City, to practise their delivery: who, calling to his assistance the banished Alcmæonidæ, together with an Army of the Lacedæmonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by his composition he gave over his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarking himself took Land at * Sigeum, whence he went to Lampsacus in Mysia governed by Æantides, who presented him to Darius. He was deprived of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty years before the battel of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Æantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perswading and practising the enterprize upon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour undertook, twenty years after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus far I have digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceive the better, the causes and motives of this War: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athens by the help of Darius, which made him solicit and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the most urgent.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principal cause of the Wars ensuing between Greece and Persia.

ANother, and a strong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick War, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, having enjoyed their liberty about 500 years, even from the Ionick migration, to the time of Crœsus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcel of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Servants to the Crown of Persia.

But as it is the custom of Nations half-conquered (witneſs Ireland) to rebell again upon every advantage and opportunity: ſo did the Ionians, and other Græcians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, ſeek by all means poſſible to free themſelves.

At this time they found ſuch men ready to ſpurr them into Rebellion, as had by the Perſian been given unto them for bridles to hold them in ſubjection. Every one of thoſe Towns had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the Government of one man) called their Tyrants. Theſe Lords were very true to the Perſian, by whoſe only might they held the people in ſubjection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when Darius, being in great extremity, they uſed all means to deliver him and his Army (that otherwiſe had been loſt) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of ſervice Hiſtiæus the Tyrant of Miletus expected the chief thanks, as having been chief Author of their expecting Darius, when the reſt, either perſwaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their own deſires, were ready to have abandoned him. But it came ſo to paſs, that Darius being more fearful of the harm that Hiſtiæus (being powerful and crafty) might do to him in the future, than mindful of the good which he had already received at his hand, found means to carry him along to Suſa, where he detained him with all kind uſage of a friend, yet kept ſuch good eſpial upon him, as an enemy, he could not ſtart away. Hiſtiæus had ſubtilty enough to diſcover the Kings purpoſe, which ill agreed with his own deſires. For he thought it more pleaſant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one fair City, having a ſmall Territory, than to ſit and feaſt at the great King's Table, and hear the Counſels by which a large Empire was managed; being himſelf an idle beholder, and enjoying with much reſtraint of liberty, none other pleaſures than a private man might beſtow upon himſelf.

Wherefore he bethought himſelf of raiſing of ſome tumults in the lower Aſia, to pacifie which, if he might be ſent, as one that had great experience and authority in thoſe quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to ſtay at home, and either ſatisfie the King with excuſes, or deal as occaſion ſhall require. Reſolving upon this courſe, he ſent very ſecret inſtructions to Ariſtagoras his kinſman, whom he had left his Deputy at Miletus, adviſing him to ſtir up ſome Rebellion. Theſe directions came ſeaſonably to Ariſtagoras, who having failed in an enterprize upon the Iſle of Naxos, through the falſe dealing of a Perſian his Aſſociate, ſtood in fear of diſgrace, if not of ſome further ill that might befall him, as one that had waſted the King's treaſures to no good purpoſe.

Therefore he readily embraced the counſel: and the better to draw the whole Countrey of Ionia into the ſame courſe which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did ſet Miletus at liberty. This plauſible beginning wan unto him the hearts of the Mileſians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom ſome he took and ſold as ſlaves to their Citizens, others he chaſed away) cauſed the whole Nation to be at his command. The Perſian Fleet, whereof he lately had been Admiral in the enterprize of Naxos, he had ſurprized in his firſt breaking out, together with the principal Officers and Captains; ſo that now he thought himſelf able to deal with the great King's forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Aſia would ſhortly be upon his neck, and cruſh both him and his aſſiſtants to pieces, unleſs he were able to raiſe an Army that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were inſufficient to perform. Therefore he took a journey to Sparta, where having aſſayed in vain with many arguments, and the offer of fifty Talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedæmonians: he went from thence to Athens, and with better ſucceſs beſought the people to lend him their aſſiſtance. The Athenian Ambaſſadours which had been ſent to the Perſian Kings Lieutenant in the lower Aſia, deſiring them not to give countenance to Hippias, now a baniſhed man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill anſwers, having found very churliſh entertainment. So that the evil which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Perſian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpoſe, their conſanguinity with the Ionians, and the perſwaſions of Ariſtagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treaſure were not helping. Twenty ſhips the Athenians furniſhed for this Voyage; to which the Eretrians furniſhed five more, in regard of the ancient Kindneſs that had paſſed between the Ionians and them. With theſe and their own forces joyned, the Ionians entred the River Caiſtrus, which falleth into the Sea by Epheſus: by which advantage they ſurprized Sardis, when no enemy was heard of or ſuſpected; inſomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in thoſe parts, had no other hope of ſafety, than by retreating himſelf into the Caſtle, which the Græcians could not force: from whence he beheld beheld the ſlaughter of the Citizens, and the City flaming.

The Perſians, at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market-place. ſtrengthened by the River Pactolus, which ran thorow it; and borrowing courage from deſperation, they both defended themſelves, and charged their enemies; who well adviſing themſelves, made all the haſte they could toward the Sea-ſide. But Artaphernes having gathered all the ſtrength he could, purſued the Græcians, and found them near Epheſus; where ſetting reſolvedly upon them, he ſlaughtered a great part of their Army, the reſt ſaving themſelves in Epheſus. In this fight, Evalcides, Captain of the Eretrians periſhed: but his fame and memory was by that excellent Poet Simonides preſerved. After this overthrow, the Athenians, which were before ſent unto Ariſtagoras, and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their tears, be perſwaded to make any ſecond trial of their fortunes on that ſide the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noiſe in the world, than the late good ſucceſs which the Perſians had in one or two skirmiſhes, could raiſe. Wherefore the Ionians bravely proceeded, won a great part of Caria; and ſending their Fleet into the Helleſpont, got Bizantium and other Towns into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately ſubdued by Cambyſes, began hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacy with the Ionians, who were able to give them aid by Sea, rebelled againſt the Perſians.

Theſe news coming to the ear of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, upon whom he vowed to take ſharp revenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to think, that they would not have dared to attempt ſuch things, but by the inſtigation of thoſe, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to provoke him. This was the main ground of the War commenced by Darius, and purſued by Xerxes, againſt Athens: To which the ſolicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gave only ſome form and aſſiſtance: the buſineſs, when once it was thus far on foot, being like enough to have proceeded, though he had periſhed, ere it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrences in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrel of Darius againſt many of the Iſlanders, if not againſt the whole Nation of the Greeks; for all of them gave to his Rebels free harbour: the Iſlanders moreover did help to furniſh out a Navy of three hundred and ſixty Sail againſt him. Theſe provocations did rather breed in him a deſire to abate their pride, than any fear of harm that they were like to do him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by ſurprize. In every fight they were beaten by the Perſians, who had not yet loſt the fruits of their diſcipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captains. In one Sea-fight by the Iſle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the upper hand; but they were Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquiſhed: neither was that victory of any uſe to them; the Cyprians, in whoſe aid they came, being utterly beaten by the Perſian Army at Land, and reduced into their old ſubjection. So had the Perſians likewiſe by open War and fair force overthrown the Carians in two battels, and reclaimed that Nation; as alſo they had recovered the Towns upon Helleſpont, with ſome Æolian and Ionian Cities, when Ariſtagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, deſirous to ſeat himſelf in Amphipolis, a Colony of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whoſe Territory belike he landed, overthrew him, and cut his troops in pieces.

About the ſame time, Hiſtiæus, the firſt mover of this inſurrection, came down into thoſe quarters; who having undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double-dealing was detected.

But this Evaſion preſerved him not long. And after many vain attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Perſians, and haſtily beheaded, leſt the King ſhould pardon him upon remembrance of old good turns; as it ſeems that he would have done, by the burial which he commanded to be given to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heavy taking of his death.

Hiſtiæus had ſought to put himſelf into Miletus; but the Citizens, doubting his conditions, choſe rather to keep him out, and make ſhift for themſelves, without his help. The ſtrength of their City by Land, which had in old time withſtood the Lydian Kings; and their good Fleet, which promiſed unto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try the uttermoſt, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Navy was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forſaking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causeless flight of those that should have assisted them. Neither was it long before the Town it self, being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slain, their wives and children made slaves, and their goods a booty to the Persians, whom for six years space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The War which Darius made upon Greece with the battell of Marathon, and Darius his death.

Herod. l. 6. THis War with good success finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable success; Darius obstinate in the enterprise and Conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the War but against the Athenians and Eritræans, who joyntly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Ambassadours, demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Æginets, and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after divers encounters forced them to give pledges, and to relinquish the party of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this War, and caused his companion King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, far the more confident of victory, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civil Wars among the Greeks. He therefore gave order to Hippagorus to prepare a Fleet of Ships, fit to transport his Army over the Hellespont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Army he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the Son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twenty years before, and by Artaphernes his Brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the less. These Commanders having their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, imbarked themselves in six hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the Islands, called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Asia the less, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Ægean Sea; but on the contrary they might alwayes both relieve themselves in the passage, and shroud themselves from all sudden tempests and out-rage.

To this end, they first possest themselves of Samos; secondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the Inhabitants despairing of their own forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Darius did not only forbear to lack, but recalling the inhabitants, he gave order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice to Apollo erected. And having recovered these & other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubœa: for that City (as already hath been shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians took ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after six dayes assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphabus and Philagius, they took it, sackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayls. From Eubœa the Persians past their Army into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens. In Herod.

The Athenians, finding the time arrived wherein they were to dispute with their own vertues against Fortune, and to cast lots for their liberty, for their wives, their children, and their lives, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withall sent away with speed to the Lacedæmonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Devil, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victory, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battell, to assist them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his return, seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly availing to bring news from the gods, and promise of assistance from Heaven, which no doubt (though the device was somewhat likely to be his own, yet) it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have been more stirred up with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solid reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand only of the Platæans (who having been formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this

Whether this City or People were of Peloponessus in Sicyonia, or of Ægæa, between Thessalia and Macedon, I do not know; but these borderers, and next the enemy, were more likely to compound than the rest far off. There is also a City called Ægium, not far from Ægæa, Livie, 32, 33, &c.

this extremity witneſs their thankfulneſs & grateful diſpoſition) began to diſpute, Whether it were moſt for their advantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themſelves into the field with ſuch forces as they had, the ſame conſiſting of ten thouſand Athenians, and one thouſand of the Platæans. In the end, and after great diverſity of opinions, Miltiades, who perſwaded the trial by battel, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians diſpoſed themſelves into three troops: two wings or horns, as they term them; and the body of a battel. The Perſians when they perceived ſo ſmall a troop advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather diſpoſſeſt of their underſtandings, than poſſeſt with the reſolution whereof they made ſhew. So invincible and reſiſtleſs the Perſians eſteemed their own numbers to be, and that ſmall troop of their enemies then in view, rather to be deſpiſed than to be fought withall: But in concluſion, the Victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, ſometime the vertue of the Græcians, and ſometimes the number of the Perſians prevailed; the Græcians fighting for all that they had, the Perſians for that they needed not, theſe great forces of Darius were diſordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their Victory even to the Sea-ſhore; where the Perſians, ſo many of them as loſt not their wits with their courage, ſaved themſelves in their Ships.

The Perſian Army conſiſted of an hundred thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe; of which there were ſlain in the place ſix thouſand three hundred, and of the Græcians an hundred fourſcore and twelve. For howſoever it came to paſs, either by ſtrange viſions, which were afterward called Pannici terrores, or by ſome other affright, it ſeemeth that the invading Army, after the firſt encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and loſt that number, by Herodotus ſet down, in their diſorderly retrait, or rather in their flat running away. As for Juſtin's report, That two hundred thouſand of the Perſian Army were ſlain, the ſame hath no appearance nor poſſibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the perſwader of the enterpriſe was ſlain, ſaith Juſtine and Cicero; but Suidas tells us, That he eſcaped, and died moſt miſerably in Lemnos. Ad Art.

The greateſt honour of this Victory was caſt upon Miltiades, who both perſwaded the trial by battel, and behaved himſelf therein anſwerably to the counſel which he gave. Themiſtocles had his firſt reputation in this fight, being but young and of the firſt beard. Thoſe of the Græcians, of mark and commandement, that fell in the firſt encounter, were Callimachus and Steſileus. It is alſo ſaid, That Cynegyrus following the Perſians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the ſhore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arreſt it with his left; of which alſo being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the firſt year of the threeſcore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Coriolanus againſt his fellow-Romans: Alexander the Son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hybilides, after Halycarnaſſæus. In vita Ariſt.

This great fray thus parted, and the Perſians returned back into the leſſer Aſia, Miltiades ſought and obtained an employment againſt the Iſlanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and paſſing over his Companies in threeſcore and ten Gallies, after ſix and twenty dayes aſſault he brake his thigh, in ſeeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himſelf being made unable, and his Companies diſcouraged, he returned to Athens; where thoſe ungrateful Citizens forgetting all his ſervices paſt, and that of all other the moſt renowned at the battel of Marathon, did by the perſwaſion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who envied his fame) caſt him into priſon, and ſet on him a fine of fifty Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his eſtate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which envy of the better ſort to each other, with their private Factions, aſſiſted by the unthankfull and witleſs people, brought them, not many years after, from a Victorious and famous Nation, to baſe ſubjection and ſlavery. Miltiades left behind him one ſon called Cymon begotten on Hegeſipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (ſaith Plutarch) was neither inferiour to his Father in valour, nor to Themiſtocles in underſtanding, but exceeded them both in Juſtice and good Government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than ſorrow for the loſs received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike proviſions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdom of great ſtrength and revenue) greatly diſtracted his reſolution for the re-invaſion of Greece. The diſſention alſo among among his Sons, of whom the younger being born after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdaining to give place to his elder brother, born before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, Death, who hath no respect of any mans affairs, gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joyned him to the earth of his Ancestors, about a year after the battel of Marathon, and after that he had reigned six and thirty years. He left behind him five sons, namely, Artabasanes, born before he obtained the Kingdom, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achæmenes Governour of Egypt, Masistes, and Anabignes.

CHAP. VI.

Of Xerxes.

§. I.

The preparations of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes received from his Father, as hereditary, a double War, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Græcians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the success ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this War, which was chiefly bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his Grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artozostres, perswaded by many arguments the Europæan War. But Artabanus, Brother to the late Darius, and Unkle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsel, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous success of the two late Invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsel: The one in person upon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his Enemies both his Army and his Honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far imbark himself in this business. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberate and sound counsel for conductor, though the success do not alwayes answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of his own nature, which only the Divine Providence, and not any humane power, can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made known to all those that opposed his desire to this War (changing opinion and counsel) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the War of Egypt was ended, four years were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this invasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand Horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts of Carriage, if we may believe Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus finds the number less by seven hundred thousand footmen. Her. l. 7.

The Commanders of the several Nations were the Princes of the blood of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise; for to these were all commandments of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their own Leaders.

The charge of the whole Army was bestowed on Mardonius, the Son of Gobrias, by a sister of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Xerxes his neerest kindred, as Generals over all; saving that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the Immortal Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slain, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sons of Datis, who commanded the late Army of Darius in Greece.

The

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200. and eight furniſhed by the Phœnicians, who had Commanders of their own Nation, and by the Cypriots, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Helleſpontines; who were truſted with the furniſhing of their own Veſſels, though commanded by the Princes of Perſia, as by Artabignes, the Son of Darius, and others. The reſt of the Veſſels for tranſportation were three thouſand. There were alſo certain Gallies furniſhed by Artemeſia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princeſs of Halicarnaſſæus, and the Iſlands adjoyning, which her ſelf commanded. Thoſe Gallies by her prepared and furniſhed, exceeded all the reſt of the Fleet, excepting thoſe of Zidon, in which Xerxes himſelf was imbarked.

§. II.

Xerxes Army entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his Bridge of Boats over the Helleſpont: and the diſcourſe between him and Artabanus upon the view of the Army.

WHen this World of an Army was throughly furniſhed, he cauſed all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendezvouz, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had aſſembled to the number of ſeventeen hundred thouſand foot, as he entred the border of Celænas, he was by one Pythius a Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattel gave food to Xerxes and his whole Army. The feaſt ended, he alſo preſented him with two thouſand Talents of Silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting ſeven thouſand of the Perſian Darici; which make ſo many of our Marks.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not only refuſe his treaſure offered, but commanded that ſeven thouſand Darici ſhould be given him to make up his four Millions; of which, ſo many thouſands were wanting when he made the Preſent. But ſoon after, when Pythius beſought him to ſpare one of his five ſons from his attendance into Greece (becauſe himſelf was old, and had none whom he could ſo well truſt as his own ſon) Xerxes moſt barbarouſly cauſed the young man, for whom his father ſought exemption, to be ſundered into two parts, commanding that the one half of his Carkaſs ſhould be layed on the right, and the other half on the left hand of the common way by which the Army marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-ſide. The one was a paſſage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the ſame (with the half Iſland or Headland, whereon it ſtood) to be an entire Iſland, ſundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, beſides the Mountain and the Cherſoneſus, or Neck of Land it ſelf: a work of more oſtentation, than of uſe, and yet an enterprize of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and a half) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to paſs in front. The Cities ſo ſevered from the main, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyſus, and Cleonæ.

He alſo gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats ſhould be made over the Helleſpont between Abidus and Seſtos, the Sea there having a mile of breadth, wanting an eighth part; which, after the finiſhing, was by a Tempeſt torn aſunder and diſſevered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than diſcouraged, commanded thoſe to be ſlain that were maſters of the work, and cauſed ſix hundred threeſcore and fourteen Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and induſtry of the Phœnicians, was ſo well anchored to reſiſt both winds blowing into, and from the Euxine Sea, as the ſame being well boorded and railed, the whole Army of ſeventeen hundred thouſand Foot, and fourſcore thouſand Horſe, with all the Moyles and Carriages, paſt over it into Europe in ſeven dayes and ſeven nights, without intermiſſion. This tranſportation of Armies did Cæſar afterward uſe. And Caligula, that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finiſhed, and the Army brought neer to the Sea-ſide, Xerxes took a view of all his Troops, aſſembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and ſeated on a place over-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoyning: and after he had gloried in his own happineſs, to behold and command ſo many Nations, and ſo powerfull an Army and Fleet, he ſuddenly (notwithſtanding) burſt out into tears, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred years there ſhould not any one ſurvive of that marvellous multitude: the cauſe of which ſudden change of paſſion when he uttered to Artabanus his Unkle, Artabanus ſpake to the King to this effect: That which which is more lamentable than the diſſolu tion of this great Troop within that num ber of years by the King remembred, is, That the life it ſelf which we enjoy is yet more miſerable than the end thereof: for in thoſe few dayes given us in the world, there is no man among all theſe, or elſe-where, that ever found himſelf ſo accompanied with happineſs, but that he oftentimes pleaſed himſelf better with the deſire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diſeaſes, and ſorrows whereto mankind is ſubject, being ſo many and inevitable, that the ſhorteſt life doth oftentimes appear unto us over long; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor reſt, but in deſired death alone.

With this melancholy diſcourſe, Xerxes being not much pleaſed, prayed Artabanus not to overcaſt thoſe joyes which they had now in purſuit with ſad remembrances. And holding ſtill a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the invaſion of Greece, againſt which he had formerly given many ſtrong reaſons, deſired him to deal freely with him, Whether he were returned to his firſt reſolution, that the enterprize of Greece could not be proſperous; or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Viſion, he was confident of good ſucceſs? Artabanus, notwithſtanding that he aſſured himſelf of the Kings reſolution to go on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpoſe it ſelf, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellouſly affrighted him, and which the King ſhould find, as he feared, to be moſt adverſe; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, becauſe it had no where in that part of the World any Port capable of ſo great a Fleet; inſomuch, as if any tempeſt ſhould ariſe, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any ſafety: and therefore when any ſuch ſhelter ſhall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to underſtand, that in ſuch a caſe of extremity, men are left to the will and diſpoſition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and diſpoſition of men. The Land, beſides other incommodities, will be found by ſo much the more an enemy, by how much the unſatiate deſire of man to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give reſiſtance, yet the want of means to feed ſuch an Army, and the Famine which cannot be prevented, will without any other violence offered, diſinable and conſume it. By theſe Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he moſt feared, to wit, the overthrow of the Army it ſelf both by Sea and Land, which ſoon after followed. Theſe cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obſtinacy had not mitpriſed them. For to invade by Sea upon a perilous Coaſt, being neither in poſſeſſion of any Port, not ſuccoured by any party, may better fit a Prince preſuming on his fortune, than enriched with underſtanding. Such was the enterpriſe of Philip the ſecond upon England in the year 1588. who had belike never heard of this Counſel of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the ſecond point; It is very likely that Xerxes his Army, which could not have in it leſs than two millions of Souls, beſides his beaſts for Service and Carriage, ſhould after a few dayes ſuffer famine, and uſing Machiavels words, Mourire ſans confeo; die without a knife. For it was impoſſible for Greece, being a ragged, ſtrait, and mountainous Countrey, to yield food (beſides what ſerved themſelves) for twenty hundred thouſand ſtrangers, whom they never meant to entertain, but with the ſharpned points of their Weapons, deſtroying withall whatſoever they could not well incloſe and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopylæ, conſiſted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thouſand, two hundred twenty men, beſides Laundreſſes, Harlots, and Horſes, and was therefore likely to endure a ſpeedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his anſwer was, That it was impoſſible to provide for all things; and that whoſoever ſhould enterpriſe any great matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidental inconveniences, he ſhould never purſue the ſame farther than the diſpute and conſultation: which if his Predeceſſors, the Perſian Kings, had done, they had never grown to that greatneſs, or poſſeſt ſo many Kingdoms and Nations, as they now did; and therefore concluded, That great enterpriſes were never undertaken without great perils. Which reſolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any neceſſity had inforc'd him to that war. But ſeeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could be conſtrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull proſperity of the Perſians endured, and that Greece was ſeparated by the Sea from the reſt of Xerxes his Dominions (of whoſe reſolution his Father Darius had made a dear experience) the fruit of this War was anſwerable anſwerable to the plantation, and the ſucceſs and end agreeable to the weak counſel whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, thoſe millions of men which he tranſported, and yet in his own judgement not ſufficient, (for he gathered in, marching on, all the ſtrength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to fear the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and reſolution, whom he conducted. For it is wiſely ſaid of thoſe uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent, ſed pondus; & impedimenta potiùs ſunt, quàm auxilium: They are great in bulk, but weak in forces, and rather a luggage than an aid.

Beſides, as it was impoſſible to marſhall ſuch a world of men in one Army, ſo the divers Nations, ſpeaking divers languages, bred the ſame confuſion among the Perſian Commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fifty thouſand choſen Souldiers in each, and ſent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furniſhed, he had either prevailed by the ſword, or forced them to forſake their territory, brought them into obedience by neceſſity and famine, which cannot be reſiſted. But while Xerxes reſolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a ſea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he imployed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himſelf, conducted by his fear, fled ſhamefully into Aſia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintred in Theſſaly, and led by Mardonius who perſwaded the enterpriſe, was in the ſummer following utterly defeated, and himſelf ſlain.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylæ and Artemiſium.

After ſuch time as Xerxes had tranſported the Army over the Helleſpont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the deſcription of his paſſage along that Coaſt, and how the River of Liſſus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the Lake near to Piſſyrus by his cattel, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will ſpeak of the encounters he had, and the ſhamefull and incredible overthrows which he received. As firſt at Thermopylæ, a narrow paſſage of half an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which did divide Theſſaly from Greece, where ſometime the Phocians had raiſed a wall with gates, which was then for the moſt part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, aſſiſted with one thouſand Tegeatæ and Mantineans, one thouſand Arcadians, and other Peloponneſians, to the number of three thouſand one hundred in the whole; beſides one thouſand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, ſeven hundred Theſpians, and all the forces (ſuch as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the paſſage two whole dayes together againſt that huge Army of the Perſians. The valour of the Greeks appeared ſo excellent in this defence, that in the firſt dayes fight, Xerxes is ſaid to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the deſtruction of his Army by one handful of thoſe men whom not long before he had utterly deſpiſed: and when the ſecond dayes attempt upon the Greeks had proved vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further; and ſo might have continued, had not a runnagate Grecian taught him a ſecret way, by which part of his Army might aſcend the ledge of mountains, and ſet upon the backs of thoſe who kept the Straits. But when the moſt valiant of the Perſian Army had almoſt incloſed the ſmall forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedæmonians with his three hundred, and ſeven hundred Theſpians, which were all that abode by him, refuſe to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not only reſiſt that world of men which charged them on all ſides; but iſſuing out of their ſtrength, made ſo great a ſlaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquiſhers, though all of them were ſlain upon the place. Xerxes, having loſt in this laſt fight, together with twenty thouſand other Souldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the vertue of ſuch as had not been preſent at theſe battels, with whom he knew that he ſhortly was to deal. Eſpecially of the Spartans he ſtood in great fear, whoſe manhood had appeared ſingular in this trial, which cauſed him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by ſaying, That the flight of the Perſian Arrows was ſo thick as would hide the Sun, he anſwered thus; It is very good news, for then ſhall we fight in the cool ſhade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds, as was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the City of Sparta could arm well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsel of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwaies well advised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces should assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that streight neck of ground which joyneth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred ships well manned, should be sent unto the Coast of Laconia, to spoil the Country, and to hold the Lacedæmonians and their neighbours busied at home, whilst Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further advised, That the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize upon the Island then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying near to the Coast of Laconia, might serve as a fit place of Randezvous upon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedæmonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrymen to have that Isle drowned in the Sea, than stand so inconveniently for them as it did. What effect this counsel might have taken, had it been followed, it is not easie to guess. But a contrary opinion of Achæmenes, Brother to King Xerxes, was preferred as the safer. For the Persian Fleet had been sorely vexed with a grievous tempest, which continued three whole daies together, wherein were lost upon the Coast of Magnesia, four hundred ships of War, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseen, that if any such calamity should overtake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achæmenes perswaded his Brother not to disperse his Fleet; for if (said he) after the loss of four hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seek adventures, then will the Greeks be strong enough by Sea to encounter the rest of the Navy, which holding all together, is invincible. To this counsel Xerxes yielded, hoping that his Land-Army and Fleet, should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilst both held one course, and lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceived; for about the same time that his Army had felt the valour of the Greeks by Land, his Navy likewise made a sorrowful proof of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecians Fleet lay at that time at Artimesium, in the straits of Eubœa, where the Persians thinking to encompass them, sent two hundred sail about the Island to fall upon them behind, using a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas, in a case not unlike, but with far different success. For that narrow channel of the Sea, which divideth Eubœa from the main, was in the same sort held by a Navy of two hundred threescore and eleven sail against the huge Persian Armado, as the straits of Thermopylæ had formerly been maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumvented, as this Navy might have been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Island, and the cause of their voyage, was too well known in the Persian Fleet, and soon enough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting sail by night, met them with a counter-surprize, taking and sinking thirty vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea; where, being over-taken with foul weather, they were driven upon the Rocks, and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Navy of the Greeks were increased by the arrival of fifty three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side, so the fear of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeem their loss with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate policy, they resolved in plain fight to repair their honour, and casting themselves into the form of a Crescent, thought so to include the Greeks, who readily did present them battel at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noon till night, and ended with equal loss to both parts. For, though more of the Persians ships were sunk and taken, yet the lesser loss fell altogether as heavy upon the Greekish Fleet, which being small, could worse bear it. Herein only the Barbarians may seem to have had the worse, that they forsook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and spoils to the enemy, who nevertheless were fain to abandon presently even the passage which they had undertaken to defend; both for that many of their ships were sorely crusht in the battel, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylæ. Before they weighed Anchors, chors, Themiſtocles, General of the Athenians, engraved upon ſtone at the watering-place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they ſhould revolt unto the Greeks, or ſtand neutral; which perſwaſion, he hoped, would either take ſome place with them, or at the leaſt make them ſuſpected by the Perſians.

§. IV.

The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

WHen Xerxes had paſt the ſtraits of Thermopylæ, he waſted the Country of the Phocians, and the regions adjoyning: as for the Inhabitants, they choſe rather to fly, and reſerve themſelves to a day of battel, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of ſaving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their ſervice. Part of his Army he ſent to ſpoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many Offerings that had been made by divers Kings, and great perſonages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the goods left in his own Palace. To make relation of a great aſtoniſhment that fell upon the companies which arrived at the Temple to have ſacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the Mount Parnaſſus, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure ſomewhat ſuperſtitious. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, ſaith, That the broken Rocks remained even to his memory in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rowled in their fall. And ſurely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for ſeeing he believed that Apollo was a god, he ſhould not have dared to entertain a covetous deſire of inriching himſelf by committing ſacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may poſſibly be true, that licenſe to chaſtiſe his impiety, in ſuch manner as is reported, was granted unto the Devil, by that Holy One, who ſaith, Will a man ſpoil his gods? and elſewhere; Hath any Nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iſles of Kittim, and behold, and ſend to Kedar, and take diligent heed, and ſee whether there be any ſuch things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcuſable, for that the Perſians alledged the burning of Cybele's Temple by the Athenians, when they ſet fire on the City of Sardis in Aſia, to be the ground and cauſe of the waſte which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprize againſt Delphos, this vizzor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, diſcovered the face of covetouſneſs ſo much the more ugly, by how much the more themſelves had profeſſed a deteſtation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meer miſchance.

Mal. 3. 8. Jer. 2. 9, 10.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expreſſed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forſaken, he took and burnt the Cittadel, and Temple, which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by ſome of more courage than wiſdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle, That Athens ſhould be ſafe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with Boards and Paliſſadoes; too weak to hold out long, though by their deſperate valour ſo well maintained at the firſt aſſault, that they might have yielded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relyed upon the Prophecy: whereof (being ſomewhat obſcure) it was wiſely done of Themiſtocles, to make diſcretion the Interpreter, applying rather the words to the preſent need, than faſhioning the buſineſs to words.

§. V.

How, Themiſtocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had, before the coming of Xerxes, removed their wives and children into Trœzene, Ægina, and Salamis, not ſo highly prizing their houſes and lands, as their freedom, and the common liberty of Greece. Nevertheleſs, this great zeal, which the Athenians did ſhew for the general good of their Country, was ill requited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to ſtay for them at Salamis, whilſt they removed their wives and children out of the City. But when the City of Athens was taken, it was preſently reſolved upon, that they ſhould forſake the Iſle of Salamis, and withdraw the Fleet to Iſthmus: which neck of land they did purpoſe to fortifie againſt the Perſians, and ſo to defend Peloponneſus by Land and Sea, leaving the reſt of Greece, as indefenſible, to the fury of the enemy. So ſhould the Iſlands of Salamis and Ægina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there beſtowed as in places of ſecurity) have been given over into mercileſs bondage. Againſt this reſolution, Themiſtocles, Admiral of the Athenian Fleet, very ſtrongly made oppoſition, but in vain. For the Peloponneſians were ſo poſſeſſed with fear of loſing their own, which they would not hazard, that no perſwaſions could obtain of them to regard the eſtate of their diſtreſſed Friends and Allies. Many remonſtances Themiſtocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis: As firſt in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, Admiral of the whole Fleet; That the ſelf-ſame fear which made them forſake thoſe coaſts of Greece, upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the firſt) cauſe them alſo to diſſever the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to withdraw himſelf to the defence of his own City and Eſtate: Then to the Council of War, which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might work in them hereafter;) he ſhewed, that the fight at Iſthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ſhips, to determine the matter in the ſtreights; and that, beſides the ſafeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they ſhould by abiding where they then were, ſufficiently defend Iſthmus; which the Barbarians ſhould not ſo much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by Sea; which they could not ſo well hope for elſewhere, as in that preſent place which gave him ſo good advantage. All this would not ſerve to retain the Peloponneſians, of whom one, unworthy of memory, upbraided Themiſtocles with the loſs of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for ſuffering one to ſpeak in the Council, that had no Country of his own to inhabit. A baſe and ſhameful objection it was, to lay as a reproach that loſs, which being voluntarily ſuſtained for the common good, was in true eſtimation by ſo much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignity did exaſperate Themiſtocles, and put into his mouth a reply ſo ſharp, as availed more than all his former perſwaſions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer City than any Nation of Greece could boaſt of; having well-near two hundred good ſhips of War, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was eaſie for them to tranſport their Families and ſubſtance into any part of the World, and ſettle themſelves in a more ſecure habitation, leaving thoſe to ſhift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refuſed to ſtand by them. Herewithal he mentioned a Town in Italy belonging of old to the ſtate of Athens, of which Town he ſaid an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians, in proceſs of time, ſhould build it a-new; and there (quoth he) will we plant our ſelves, leaving unto you a ſorrowful remembrance of my words, and of your own unthankfulneſs. The Peloponneſians hearing thus much, began to enter into better conſideration of the Athenians; whoſe affairs depended not, as they well perceived, upon ſo weak terms, that they ſhould be driven to crouch to others; but rather were ſuch, as might enforce the reſt to yield to them, and condeſcend even to the uttermoſt of their own demands.

For the Athenians, when they firſt embraced that Heroical reſolution, of leaving their grounds and houſes to fire and ruine, if neceſſity ſhould enforce them ſo far, for the preſervation of their liberty, did employ the moſt of their private wealth, and all the common treaſure, in building a great Navy. By theſe means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no ſuch calamity ſhould befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoiſed by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well, that a ſtrong Fleet would either procure victory at home, or a ſecure paſſage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it ſufficient, if building a few new ſhips, they did ſomewhat amend their Navy. Whereby it came to paſs, that, had they been vanquiſhed, they could not have expected any other fortune, than either preſent death, or perpetual ſlavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the aſſiſtance of the Athenians, whoſe forces by Sea did equal all theirs together; the whole conſiſting of more than three hundred and fourſcore bottoms. Wherefore theſe Peloponneſians beginning to ſuſpect their own condition, which would have ſtood upon deſperate points, if the Fleet of Athens had forſaken them, were ſoon perſwaded, by the greater fear of ſuch a bad event, to forget the leſſer, which they had conceived of the Perſians; and laying aſide their inſolent bravery, they yielded to that moſt profitable counſel of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Perſians conſulted about giving battel: and how Themiſtocles by policy held the Greeks to their reſolution; with the victory at Salamis thereupon enſuing.

IN the mean ſeaſon, the Perſians had entred into conſultation, whether it were convenient to offer battel to the Greeks, or no. The reſt of the Captains giving ſuch advice as they thought would beſt pleaſe the King their Maſter, had ſoon agreed upon the fight; but Artemiſia Queen of Halicarnaſſæus, who followed Xerxes to this War in perſon, was of contrary opinion: Her counſel was, that the King himſelf directly ſhould march toward Peloponneſus, whereby it would come to paſs, that the Greek Navy (unable otherwiſe to continue long at Salamis for want of proviſion) ſhould preſently be diſſevered, and every one ſeeking to preſerve his own City and Goods, they ſhould, being divided, prove unable to reſiſt him, who had won ſo far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give battel; ſo on the other ſide, the danger will be more (ſaid ſhe) which we ſhall undergo, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the loſs, in caſe it fall upon us, greater than the profit of the Victory which we deſire. For if we compel the enemies to fly, it is more than they would have done, we ſitting ſtill: but if they, as better Seamen than ours, put us to the worſt, the journey to Peloponneſus is utterly daſht, and many that now declare for us, will ſoon revolt unto the Greeks. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had ſent for that purpoſe to the Fleet, related unto his Maſter the common conſent of the other Captains, and withall this diſagreeing opinion of Artemiſia. The King, well pleaſed with her advice, yet reſolved upon following the more general, but far worſe counſel of the reſt; which would queſtionleſs have been the ſame which Artemiſia gave, had not fear and flattery made all the Captains utter that, as out of their own judgement, which they thought to be moſt conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vain perſwaſion of much good, that his own preſence upon the ſhore to behold the conflict, would work among the Souldiers. Therefore he encamped upon the Sea-ſide, pitching his own Tent on the Mount Ægaleus, which is oppoſite unto the Iſle of Salamis, whence at eaſe he might ſafely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write down the acts and behaviour of every Captain. The near approach of the Barbarians, together with the news of that timorous diligence which their Countrymen ſhewed in fortifying the Iſthmus, and of a Perſian Army, marching apace thither, did now again ſo terrifie and amaze the Peloponneſians, that no entreaty nor conteſtation would ſuffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madneſs to fight for a Country already loſt, when they rather ſhould endeavour to ſave that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themſelves what miſery would befall them, if, loſing the Victory, they ſhould be driven into Salamis, there to be ſhut up, and beſieged round in a poor deſolate Iſland.

Hereupon they reſolved forthwith to ſet ſail for Iſthmus; which had preſently been done, if the wiſdom of Themiſtocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent fear had ſtopt up their ears againſt all good counſel, did practiſe another courſe, and forthwith labour to prevent the execution of this unwholſome decree; not ſuffering the very hour of performance to find him buſie in wrangling altercation. As ſoon as the Council brake up, he diſpatched ſecretly a truſty Gentleman to the Perſian Captains, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to ſend part of their Navy about the Iſland, which incompoſing the Greeks, might prevent their eſcape; giving them withall falſe hope of his aſſiſtance. The Perſians no ſooner heard than believed theſe good news, well knowing that the Victory was their own aſſured, if the Athenian Fleet joyned with them; which they might eaſily hope, conſidering what ability their Maſter had to recompence for ſo doing, both the Captains with rich rewards, and the people with reſtitution of their City, and Territories. By theſe means it fell out, that when the Greeks very early in the morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themſelves incloſed round with Perſians, who had laboured hard all that night, ſending many of their ſhips about the Iſle of Salamis, to charge the enemy in rear, and landing many of their men in the Iſle of Pſittalea, which lyeth over againſt Salamis, to ſave ſuch of their own, and kill ſuch of the Grecian party, as by any misfortune ſhould be caſt upon the ſhore. Thus did meer neceſſity enforce the Grecians to undertake the battel in the ſtraights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable Victory, ſtemming the foremoſt of their enemies, and chaſing the reſt, who falling foul one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor fly. I do not find any particular occurrences in this great battel to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a weariſom taſk of writing down many diſaſters that befell the Perſian Fleet, which ill acquitted it ſelf that day, doing no one piece of ſervice worthy the preſence of their King, or the regiſtring of his Notaries. As for the Greeks, they might well ſeem to have wrought out that Victory with equal courage, were it not that the principal honour of that day was ascribed to those of Ægina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did fly towards Phalerus, where the Land-Army of Xerxes lay, the ships of Ægina having possest the Straights, did sink or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

Of things following after the battel of Salamis : and of the flight of Xerxes.

After this Victory, the Greeks intending by way of Scrutiny, to determine which of the Captains had best merited of them, in all this great Service; every Captain, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write down his own name, but, in the second place, as best deserving next unto himself, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yielded unto vertue, as soon as her own turn was served. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of War; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the War, began to cast a wary eye upon his Master, fearing lest his counsel should be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuit of the Victory, than to cast it away by undergoing his Princes indignation, he advised the King to leave unto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promised to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to sooth Xerxes with many fair words, telling him, That the cowardise of those Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metal, nothing better than slaves, who had so ill behaved themselves in the late Sea-service, did not concern his honour, who had alwayes been victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it self, against which the War was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings ear, who presently betook himself to his journey homewards, making the more haste, for that he understood, how the Greeks had a purpose to sail to Hellespont, and there to break down his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greeks had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that he would leave his Army not so strong, as it should have been, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counsel, that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessity should enforce the Persians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement unto this timerous Prince, advising him to convey himself into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissolved: which counsel Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torn in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbark himself in some obscure vessel, it is not greatly material; though the Greeks did most willingly imbrace the latter of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country, that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as also between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians, after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawn himself into Thessaly, whence he sent Alexander the son of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as far as their own desires; allowing them to retain their liberty and laws, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that War.

The Athenians had now re-entred their City, but not as yet brought back their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Army of Mardonius was broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, understanding what fair conditions this Embassador would propound, were perplexed with very great fear, lest he should find good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatch their Embassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, used the best of their perswasion to retain the Athenians nians firm. They alledged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of War against the rest of Greece, but had only threatned the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that City, were drawn into the quarrel, wherein the Athenians without much cruelty of injustice could not leave them. We know, said they, that ye have endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forsake the Town, the houses thereof be ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintain as our own, your wives and children amongst us, as long as the War shall continue, hoping that ye, who have alwayes procured liberty to others, will not now go about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oaths are of no assurance. It was needless to use many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilst the Sun continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any riches, with which he might seek to make purchase of their liberty. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustain themselves, only desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all speed they would cause their Army to march, forasmuch as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessaly, having once received such a peremptory answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readiness to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For he, as soon as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith lead his Army towards them, and their City: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more security abroad in the Country, where they expected the arrival of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent unto them, with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principal of them to his party. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, & to have those which were already laid waste, re-edified at the Kings charges: Or, if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would rely upon their old confederats, whose succors did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the leaders might be won with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should fail, the destruction of Athens would be a good mean to please his Master, King Xerxes; who must thereby needs understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their own Country. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrcilus, advised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Counsel-house, heard what he had said, immediately set upon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were fear or money, that had moved him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, and in the Isle of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsel, and bad end, assembling together did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bravery notwithstanding, when they perceived the slackness of the Peloponnesians in giving them aid, they were fain to betake themselves to Salamis again, the old place of their security. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardness in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very severe messages to Sparta, complaining of their slackness, and threatning withal, to take such course as might stand best with their own good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatory answers; which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded athwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed careless and dull, so the Athenians hotly pressed them to a quick resolution, giving them plainly to understand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian Fleet lay upon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Navy contained it self within the Harbours upon Europe side; both to do service where need should require at home, and withal to shun the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that (being distracted from the rest) had ventured over-far. So mutual fear preserved in quiet the Islands lying in the midst of the Ægean Seas. But it was well and seasonably observed by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Isthmus would serve ſerve to little purpoſe for the defence of Peloponneſus, if once the Athenians gave ear to Mardonius: conſidering that many doors would be opened into that Demy-Iſland, as ſoon as the Enemy ſhould by winning the friendſhip of Athens, become the Maſter of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians upon this admonition, making better peruſal of their own dangers, were very careful to give ſatisfaction to the Athenian Embaſſadors, who not brooking their delayes, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it ſeemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore diſpatching away five thouſand Spartans in the evening, under conduct of Pauſanias, they gave audience the next day to the Embaſſadors, whoſe complaints they anſwered with vehement proteſtations of their readineſs; deeply ſwearing that the Army of Sparta was already far upon the journey, and giving them leave to take up other five thouſand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adjoyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though diſtaſting ſuch want of gravity, in a matter ſo important, were nevertheleſs contented with the final concluſion; and levying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haſte they could to incamp in Attica. The other Grecians were nothing ſlack in ſending forth Companies, whoſe near approach cauſed Mardonius to forſake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much diſadvantage to Horſe, wherein conſiſted the beſt of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating down the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly eſcaped the fury of War.

The great battel of Platæa.

IT were too long a rehearſal to ſhew all that happened in many ſkirmiſhes between the Greeks and him, in the Country of Bœotia, which Mardonius had choſen to be the ſeat of that War. Much time was ſpent before the quarrel was decided by the trial of one main battel: for both parties did ſtand upon their guard, each expecting when the other ſhould aſſail them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thouſand, which were by him choſen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoyned the forces of Thebes, Macedony, Theſſaly, and other parts of Greece, that now ſiding with the Perſian, furniſhed his Camp with fifty thouſand men. Againſt theſe the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leavied an Army of one hundred and ten thouſand, of which forty thouſand were weightily armed, the reſt were only aſſiſtants to theſe forty thouſand, being armed more ſleightly, as rather to make excurſions and give chaſe, than to ſuſtain any ſtrong charges.

Theſe two Armies having eleven dayes confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of ſervice; Mardonius, whoſe victuals began to fail, reſolved to begin the fray. The Greeks were promiſed Victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plain of Ceres and Proſerpina, making prayers unto certain gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to find the certain place which the Oracle deſigned: For the plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was alſo an old Temple of Ceres and Proſerpina, near unto the place where they lay at that time encamped; as likewiſe the memorials of thoſe Nymphs and Demi-gods, were in the ſame place, upon Mount Cithæron; and the ground ſerved well for footmen againſt horſe; only the Land belonged unto the Platæans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilſt the Greeks were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtful Oracle, the Platæans, to make all clear, did freely beſtow their Land on that ſide the Town upon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Platæans cauſed Alexander the Great, many ages after, to re-edifie their City; which was ruined in the Peloponneſian Wars.

All things being ready for battel, the Lacedæmonian General thought it moſt meet, that the Athenians ſhould ſtand oppoſite that day to the Medes and Perſians, whom they had formerly vanquiſhed at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, ſhould entertain the Thebans and other Greeks which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them oftentimes before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius underſtanding, (whether fearing the Athenians, of whoſe valour the Medes and Perſians had felt heavy proof, or deſiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the braveſt Souldiers in Greece) he did alſo change the order of his battel, and oppoſe himſelf to Pauſanias. All the Greeks might well perceive how the Enemy did ſhift his wings, and Pauſanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did alſo the like. So one whole day was ſpent in changing to and fro.

Some

Some attempt the Perſians made that day with their Archers on horſe-back, who did ſo moleſt the Greeks at their watering-place, that they were fain to enter into conſultation of retiring; becauſe they could not without much loſs to themſelves, and none to the enemy, lye near to that fountain which did ſerve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themſelves to diſ-lodge; and part of the Army being ſent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being incouraged by their flight, (which to him ſeemed to proceed out of meer cowardiſe) he charged them in the rear with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedæmonians being over-taken by the enemies horſe, and over-whelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly ſit ſtill, not making any reſiſtance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and ſlain, and ſome of eſpecial mark loſt, before any ſign of good ſucceſs appeared in the entrails.

But as ſoon as Pauſanias had found in the Sacrifice thoſe tokens, which the ſuperſtition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gave the Signal of battel: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did ſit upon the ground, as was their manner, aroſe altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any fear of ſuch notable reſiſtance. The reſt of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Pauſanias, came in apace to ſuccour the Lacedæmonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great battel, becauſe the Thebans, and other Greeks confederated with the Perſians, gave them check by the way. Nevertheleſs, the Spartans, with other their aſſiſtants, did ſo well acquit themſelves, that the Perſians were vanquiſhed, and Mardonius with many thouſands more ſlain in the field; the reſt fled into the Camp, which they had fortified with wooden Walls, and there defended themſelves with ſuch courage, as deſperate neceſſity inforced them unto, holding out the longer, becauſe the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of aſſaulting Fortreſſes, and Walls. In the mean time the Athenians having found ſtrong oppoſition of the Thebans and Theſſalians, did with much labour and courage obtain victory, which having not long purſued, they came to help the Lacedæmonians, whom they found warily buſied in aſſaulting the Camp, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themſelves undertook it, and in ſhort ſpace forced a paſſage thorow the Wall; at which breach firſt, and then on all ſides, the Greeks entred with ſuch fury, and juſt deſire of vengeance, that of three hundred thouſand, they are ſaid not to have left three thouſand alive, excepting thoſe who fled away with Artabazus, when as the Perſian Army firſt fell to rout.

If the execution were ſo great, as is reported, an eſpecial cauſe of it was the fooliſh retreat, or rather flight into the Camp. For, though it were ſo, that the place was well fortified, and the number of thoſe who caſt themſelves into it greater than any of the Aſſailants; yet they being of ſeveral Nations and Languages, and having loſt their General, with other principal Commanders, it was impoſſible that they in ſuch a terrour and aſtoniſhment ſhould make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy-Country, againſt an Army of men, far more valiant than themſelves, and enflamed with preſent victory. Therefore the ſame Wall, which for a few hours had preſerved their lives, by holding out the enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the ſlaughtering fury of unpitiful Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Theſſaly, and other Countries in his way, that he was ſent by Mardonius upon ſome piece of ſervice: For he well knew, that had they underſtood any thing of that great diſcomfiture, all places would have been hoſtile unto him, and ſought with his ruine to purchaſe favour of the vanquiſhers. Therefore making ſo large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble, were left behind and loſt, he came to Byzantium, whence he ſhipped his men over into Aſia. Such was the end of the vain-glorious Expedition, undertaken by Xerxes againſt the Greeks, upon hope of Honour, and Conqueſt, though ſorting otherwiſe, accordingly as Artabazus had foreſeen, and rather worſe, foraſmuch as it began the quarrel, which never ended before the ruine of the Perſian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greeks, deſpiſed and ſought to have been brought into ſlavery. Hereby it may ſeem, that the viſion appearing to Xerxes, was from God himſelf, who had formerly diſpoſed of thoſe things, ordaining the ſubverſion of the Perſian Monarchy by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entred into greater conſideration of their own ſtrength, and the weakneſs of their Enemies.

The Battel of Mycale; with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning: and examples of the like.

THe same day on which the Battel was fought at Platæa, there was another Battel fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian Fleet rode.

Lutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navy, at the request of some Illanders and Ionians, did sail into those parts, to deliver the Samians, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himself at this time lay at Sardis, a City in Lydia, not far from the Sea-side, having left threescore thousand under the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia, and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes, and Ithramitres, Admirals of the Persian Fleet, understood that the Greeks bent their course towards them, they did forth-with draw their ships aground, fortifying with Palissadoes, and otherwise, as much ground as was needfull for the encamping of all their Land and Sea-forces. Leutychides at his arrival, perceiving that they meant to keep within their strength, and resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his Gally close aboard the shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for fear, than good will, were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greek tongue to remember liberty, and use the fair occasion which they now had to recover it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubœa, trusting that either these perswasions would prevail, or, if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealousie in them, causing them to fight in fear of their own companions. It need not seem strange, that this very same stratagem, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now in his declining estate, gave a willing ear to the sweet sound of liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former bravery, little regarded, and less feared, any treason to be contrived by their subjects, were now so wary, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they took away their arms; the Milesians, whom they did suspect, but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the streight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold upon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully, within the Camp; which examples the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to have found some that durst begin. It is said, that while the Greeks were yet in a march toward the Enemies Camp, a rumour suddenly ran in the Army, that Mardonius was overthrown in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captains to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the Battel of Platæa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report of that great Battel, wherein Paulus Æmilius overthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four dayes, as Livie with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kind. As that of the Battel by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of, the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the Battel against the Tarquinians and the Latins, presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebel to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germany, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himself Emperour; which news much troubling the City of Rome, with fear of a dangerous War, it was suddenly reported, that Antonius was slain, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publick joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Author of these tydings could not be found, the Emperour Domitian betook himself to his journey against the Rebel; and being now with his Army in march, he received advertisement by Post, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the self-same victory, he found that the report and victory were born upon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make above five and twenty hundred miles) asunder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgery or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not be found found (as happens in dreams among many thousand vain and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit we may find, that God himself doth sometimes use to terrifie those who presume upon their own strength, by these light means of tumultuous noises: as he raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as he threatned Senacherib, saying, Isa. 37. 7. Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a noyse, and return to his own Land. Wherefore it may well have been true, that God was pleased by such means as this, to animate the Greeks; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavy hearts, being in great fear, lest their own adventure should by no means fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their own Country of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius, whilest they went wandring to seek out Enemies a-far off, upon the coast of Asia. But, the fame of the Battel fought at Platæa being noised among them, every man desired that his own valour in the present fight, might be some help to work out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plain, directly towards the Enemies Camp; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and streight passages, to win the higher ground. The Athenians did first set upon the Camp (ere the Lacedæmonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way thorow the Palisadoes and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not save themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good service, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who upon the like jealousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had been sent of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-paths. The Lacedæmonians that day did little service, for the business was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such companies as retired in whole troops; making them flie dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to do the greater execution upon them. This was the last fight of that huge Army levied against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no means left to make offensive War.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affairs to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not far from the place of this Battel; but little mind had he to revenge either this, or other his great losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom he could not prevail by intreaty, nor would obtain his desire by force. Because he respected much his Brother her Husband, he thought it best to make a match between his own Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to find occasion of such familiarity as might work out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reject him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him, he soon after fell in love with his own Sons Wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to govern himself in peace, as to guide his Army in war. This young Lady having once desired the King to give her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his own Wife, caused the Queen thereby to perceive her Husbands conversation with her, which she imputed not so much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceived extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royal Feast, wherein the custom was, that the King should grant their request, she craved that the Wife of Masistes, her Husbands Brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the abuse of such a custom, or have deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatning her self with the like, to whatsoever she should inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the request; and sending for his Brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seems, that he understood how villainously that poor Lady should be intreated, whom he knew to be virtuous, and whom himself had loved. Masistes refused to put her away; alledging his own love, her deserving, and their common children, one of which was married to the Kings Son, as reasons important to move him to keep her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reviled him, saying, That he now should neither keep the Wife which he had, nor have his Daughter whom he had promiſed unto him. Maſiſtes was much grieved with theſe words, but much more, when returned home, he found his Wife moſt butcherly mangled by the Queen Ameſtris, who had cauſed her Noſe, Lips, Ears, and Tongue to be cut off; and her Breaſts in like manner, which were caſt unto Dogs. Maſiſtes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children, and ſome friends, towards Bactria, of which Province he was Governour, intending to rebell and avenge himſelf: But Xerxes underſtanding his purpoſe, cauſed an Army to be levied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the ſword. Such was the Tyrannical condition of the Perſian Government; and ſuch are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joyned with abſolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his overthrown, and lying upon the ground, ſaid, That he doubted, whether in regard of his virtue, he ſhould again erect it; or, for the miſchief done by him to Greece, ſhould let it lye. But ſurely, whatſoever his other good qualities were, he was fooliſh, and was a coward, and conſequently mercileſs.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the virtue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Perſian Empire was ſo ſurely laid, that all the wickedneſs and vanities of Xerxes, and other worſe Princes, could not overthrow it, until it was broken by a virtue almoſt equal to that which did eſtabliſh it. In wars againſt the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the firſt it had been, very good; but againſt the general eſtate of Greece, neither he, or any of his poſterity, did ever make offenſive war, but received many loſſes in Aſia, to which the laſt at Mycale ſerved but as an introduction; teaching the Greeks, and eſpecially the Athenians, that the Perſian was no better Souldier at his own doors, than in a forein Countrey: whereof good trial was made forth-with, and much better proof as ſoon as the affairs of Athens were quietly ſetled and aſſured.

From this time forward I will therefore purſue the Hiſtory of Greece, taking in the matters of Perſia, as alſo the eſtate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time ſhall preſent them. True it is, that the Perſian eſtate continued in her greatneſs, many ages following, in ſuch wiſe, that the known parts of the world had no other Kingdom, repreſenting the Majeſty of a great Empire.

But this greatneſs depended only upon the riches and power that had formerly been acquired, yielding few actions, or none, that were worthy of remembrance, excepting ſome Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that exceſſive Luxury, wherewith both it, and all, or the moſt of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unwieldy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry ſwords of poor and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to paſs, that Xerxes and his ſucceſſors were fain to defend their Crowns with money & baſe policies; very ſeldom or never (unleſs it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the tryal of plain battel with that little Nation of Greece; which would ſoon have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and jealouſie urged every City to envy the height of her neighbours walls, and thereby diverted the ſwords of the Greeks into their own bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued, to hew out the way of Conqueſt, on the ſide of Aſia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that paſſed in Greece from the end of the Perſian War, to the beginning of the Peloponneſian.

§. I.

How Athens was re-built and fortified.

AFter that the Medes and Perſians had received their laſt blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leutichydes, who then commanded the Græcian Army, leaving the purſuit of the War to the Athenians, aſſiſted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedæmonians and other Peloponneſians to Sparta, and and other places, out of which they had been leavied. The Athenians in the mean while beſieged Seſtos, a City on the ſtrait of the Helleſpont, between which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately faſtened his Bridge of Boats: where the Inhabitants, deſperate of ſuccour, did not long diſpute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themſelves the Winter following on that ſide the Helleſpont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children, ſince the invaſion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in divers Iſlands, and at Trœzen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their own places.

And though the moſt part of all their houſes in Athens were burnt and broken down, and the walls of the City over-turned, yet they reſolved firſt on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to cover themſelves, their wives and children, with any private buildings. Whereof the Lacedæmonians being advertiſed, and miſliking the fortifying of Athens, both in reſpect that their own City of Sparta was unwalled, as alſo becauſe the Athenians were grown more powerfull by Sea, than either themſelves, or any other State of Greece, they diſpatched meſſengers to the Athenians to diſſwade them; not acknowledging any private miſlike or jealouſie, but pretending, that if the Perſians ſhould return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better ſtate to defend themſelves than heretofore, the ſame would ſerve to receive their enemies, and to be made a Seat for the War, as Thebes had lately been. To this the Athenians promiſed to give them ſatisfaction by their own Embaſſadours very ſpeedily. But being reſolved to go on with their works, by the advice of Themiſtocles, they held the Lacedæmonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raiſed their walls to that height, as they cared not for their miſlikes, nor doubted their diſturbance; and therefore (to gain time) they diſpatched Themiſtocles towards Lacedæmon, giving him for excuſe, that he could not deliver the Athenians reſolutions, till the arrival of his fellow-Commiſſioners, who were of purpoſe retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being converted into jealouſie (for by the arrival of divers perſons out of Attica, they were told for certain, That the walls of Athens were ſpeedily grown up beyond expectation) Themiſtocles prayed them not to believe reports and vain rumors, but that they would be pleaſed to ſend ſome of their own truſty Citizens to Athens, from whoſe relation they might reſolve themſelves, and determine accordingly. Which requeſt being granted, and Commiſſioners ſent, Themiſtocles diſpatched one of his own, by whom he adviſed the Athenians, firſt to entertain the Lacedæmonians with ſome ſuch diſcourſe as might retain them a few dayes, and in concluſion to hold them among them, till himſelf, and the other, Athenian Embaſſadours, then at Sparta, had their liberty alſo to return. Which done, and being alſo aſſured by his aſſociats and Ariſtides, that Athens was already defenſible on all parts, Themiſtocles demanding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true that the walls of Athens were now raiſed to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedæmonians to believe, That whenſoever it pleaſed them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for ſuch as right well underſtood what appertained to a Common-weal and their own ſafety, without direction and advice from any other: That they had in the War of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themſelves to the wooden Walls of their Ships, from the reſolutions of their own counſels and courage, and not thereto taught or perſwaded by others: and finally, in all that perilous War againſt the Perſians, they found their own judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferiour, or leſs fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-weal among the Greeks. And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Maſters and Judges of their own affairs, and thought it good reaſon, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece ſhould be left open, or elſe that the Walls of Athens ſhould be finiſhed and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time unfit for quarrel, diſſembled their miſlike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diviſion; and ſo ſuffered the Athenians to depart, and received back from them their own Embaſſadors.

The Walls of Athens finiſhed, they alſo fortified the Port Pyræus, by which they might under covert imbark themſelves upon all occaſions.

§. II.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatness, and prosperous War made by that State upon the Persian.

THE Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the War against the Persians, to which the Lacedæmonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sail for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedæmonian; where, after their landing having possest themselves of many principal places, they imbarked the Army again, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the Persians by force the City Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behaving himself more like a Tyrant than a Captain, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called back by the Council of Lacedæmon, and not only accused of many insolent behaviours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Countrey. In his stead they imployed Dorces, who either gave the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandement in that War, practised the Souldiers to complain; though indeed the wise and vertuous behaviour of Aristides, General of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable sincerity, had been able to make a good Commander seem ill in comparison of himself; and therefore was much more available, in rendring those detested, whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being no less wearied of the War, than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honour which they desired: for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatness in that present age, and of their ruin in the next succeeding. For the charge of the War being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to levy mony, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the general defence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the less, and the Illands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever paid by the Greeks) amounted to four hundred and threescore Talents, which was raised easily by the honest care of that just man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complain of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, and other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great commodity; so the desire which they conceived of encreasing their commodity, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the general love, which had made them powerful, abandoned their City to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these four hundred and threescore Talents were raised to six hundred; nor long after that, ere their covetous tyranny had converted their followers into slaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteeen hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these sums were laid up, and where, at the general Assembly, the Captains of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for form sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by Sea than all Greece besides, had lockt up the common treasure in an Island, under their own protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The general Commander in this War was Cimon, the son of Miltiades, who first took Eionia, upon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Caristii, and brought into servitude the Naxii, contrary to the form of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or disobeyed their commandements; taking upon them and usurping a kind of soveraign authority over the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the War in their own persons, and given up altogether to their ease, made choice rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of War, or in Ships; leaving the provision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Wars; the other greatly strengthened their Navy and their experiences, being alwayes armed and imployed in honourable services, at the cost of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, levied upon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians, at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admiral scouring the Asiatick Seas, took in the City of Phaselis; which having formerly pretended neutrality, and refused to relieve, or any way assist the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he set sail for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet rode, being of six hundred sail, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fifty, and having a great Land-Army, encamped upon the shoar; all which forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, were utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ships taken by the Athenians; the rest being broken to pieces, or sunk, ere ever they had swom in the Greekish Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great Victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very soon presented with a third. For fourscore sail of Phœnicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, under the Persian command) thinking to have joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived upon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing less than what ensued. Upon the first notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they only sought to run themselves on ground; by which mean preserving few of their men, they lost all their ships. These losses did so break the courage of the Persian, that omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condescended to whatsoever Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Asia; and further covenanting, That none of his ships of War should sail to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyaneæ and Chelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any War that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till such time as under Alexander, they overthrew the Empire of Persia; in which War, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but served altogether under the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treason of Artabanus.

BEsides these losses, which could not easily have been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gave just cause to the Persian of seeking peace upon any terms not altogether intollerable. For Artabanus, the Unkle of Xerxes, perceiving, that the King his Master did easily take small occasions to shed the blood of such, as in kindred or place were neer unto him, began to repose less hope of Safety in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soveraignty, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his cruelty, and despised for his cowardise and misfortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found means to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himself had been innocent) he accused Darius the Son of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickedness he got the Kingdom, and held it seven months; or whether, intending the like evil to Artaxerxes the son of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and surprised, were hard to affirm any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken he was, and with his whole family put to death by extream torments, according to the sentence whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verse;

Rarò antecedentem scelestum
Deseruit pede pœna claudo.

Seldom the villain, though much haste he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance fails to overtake.

§. IV.

The banishment of Themistocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia; and his death.

ARtaxerxes being established in his Kingdom, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessity of his affairs required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greeks, than he or his predecessors had ever hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their own merit in that service, that they not only thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders over many Towns and Islands of the Greeks, but even within their own walls, they would admit none other form of Government vernment than meerly Democratical. Herein they were so insolent, that no integrity nor good desert was able to preserve the estate of any such as had born great office, longer, than by flattering the rascal multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatness upon popularity, yet now presuming upon his good services done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to check their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had received from him, that they laid upon him the punishment of Ostracism, whereby he was banished for ten years, as a man over-burthensome to the Commonwealth.

Before the time of his return was half expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedæmonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece unto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles, finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty cities, was driven after many troublesom flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himself into Persia, where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his affairs by the counsel and assistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitless. For when the Athenians, in favour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Army in Egypt, and scouring those Eastern Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had given, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greeks.

But whether Themistocles perceived much unlikelines of good succes, in leading a great army of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in favour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the love of his Countrey would not permit him to seek honour by the ruine of it; sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulnes to his well-deserving Prince, and natural affection to his own ill-deserving people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

THen was Artaxerxes driven to use the service of his own Captains in the Egyptian war, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred sail strong was sent forth under Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintain; the Persian being utterly broken at Sea, and thereby unable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to have been kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proof of the Græcian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any Ships of War (without which the Greeks could receive no harm from him): whereof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken; and, if not this whole estate, yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemy too far overmatching him, Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worser fortunes he had made with them, he would break in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might utterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their revenues and power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take, whilest they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and he unable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottom of the streights between Cilicia, Syria, and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seek to enrich himself by trade with those Countreys, or to infest one or more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sudden well-nigh nigh choaked with a greater morſell, to ſnatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might eaſily have ſwallowed and digeſted. For Inarus King of the Lybians, confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Country was exhauſted by the late Wars, and how weakly defended by very ſlender Perſian Garriſons, conceived rightly, that if ſuch ſmall forces as the Satrapa, or Viceroy, could make on the ſudden of his own Guards, or levy out of the ordinary Garriſons, were by him defeated, the naturals of the Country not long ſince oppreſſed by Cambyſes, and, after a revolt, very lately ſubdued by Xerxes, would ſoon break faith with him, who had no other title to that Kingdom than a good ſword. Further, he perſwaded himſelf that the people, unable to defend themſelves againſt the Perſian without his aſſiſtance, would eaſily be drawn to accept him, the author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did this hope deceive him. For having taken and cruelly ſlain Achemænes the Viceroy, divers Cities forthwith declared themſelves for him, and proclaiming him King, ſhewed the moſt of their endeavour for proſecution of the War. But he conſidering his own weakneſs, and that the means of the Egyptians his adherents were not anſwerable to their deſires, perceived well, that to reſiſt the power of Artaxerxes, far greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price ſoever he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian Fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein imbarqued; he invited the Commanders to ſhare with him the Kingdom of Egypt, as a far greater reward of their adventure, than ſuch an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their eſtate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly ſorted according to their expectation) would have been contented with an equal ſhare, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unneceſſary. He was poſſeſſed of the peoples love, they were of moſt power. But the iſſue of thoſe affairs was ſuch as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they ſhared ſomewhat equally.

Yet had the beginning of their enterpriſe very good and hopefull ſucceſs: For they entred the Land, as far as to Memphis, the principal City; and of the City it ſelf they took two parts: to the third part, which was called, the White wall, they laid ſuch hard ſiege, that neither thoſe forces of the Perſians, which then were in Egypt, were ſtrong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes well adviſe what means to uſe for the recovery of that which was loſt, or for the preſervation of the remainder. The beſt of his hope was, by ſetting the Lacedæmonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to look homewards to their own defence. This was the firſt time that the Perſian ſought to procure the aſſiſtance of the Greeks one againſt the other, by ſtirring them up with gold, to the entertainment of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpoſe he ſent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treaſure; who after great expence, finding that the Lacedæmonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force againſt the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithſtanding the abſence of their Army in Egypt; he thought it his wiſeſt way to employ the reſt of his money and means, to their relief who had now the ſpace of ſix years defended his maſters right in Egypt. Therefore he haſtily diſpatched another of his name, the ſon of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was firſt encountred by the revolted people; over whom he obtained victory, which made him maſter of the Country, whilſt the Athenians lay buſied about Memphis the great City.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a ſtrange ayr, and want of ſupply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: ſure it is, that when Megabazus, having reduced the Country to obedience, attempted the City it ſelf, whether his former ſucceſs had amended the courage of the Perſians, or want of neceſſaries made the Athenians inferiour to themſelves, he chaſed them out of Memphis, and purſued them ſo near, as they were forced to fortifie themſelves in the Iſle of Proſopites, where Megabazus, after eighteen months ſiege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, aſſaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, took their Gallies, and put all to the ſword, ſave a few that ſaved themſelves by flight into Lybia; the ſame entertainment had fifty other Gallies, which they ſent to the ſuccour of the firſt two hundred. For thoſe Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Army was conſumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, which is called Mendeſium, and fell unawares among the Phœnician Gallies, and the Perſian Army; ſo as the Perſians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians ſix years War in Egypt, and the reward

Proſopites an Iſland between the Rivers of Taly and Pharmutiacus, two of the outlets of Nilus towards Alexandria.

Medenſus is an Iſland in the mouth of Nilus, between the outlet called Buſiriticos, and Dielcos: But the branch of Nilus, called Mendeſium, runneth into the ſea by the City Panæphyſis.

of their vanity and indiſcretion to undertake many enterpriſes at once.

§. V.

Of other Wars made by the Athenians for the moſt part with good ſucceſs, about the ſame time.

NOtwithſtanding theſe overthrows in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-Wars waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces againſt the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwiſe. For as they were beaten near unto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, ſo they obtained two great victories ſoon after; the one over the Peloponneſians, near unto Cecryphalia; the other over the Æginets, near unto Ægina, where they ſunk and carried away threeſcore and ten Gallies of their enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the ſudden, and beſieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithſtanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight with equal loſs, the Corinthians, when they returned again to ſet up their Trophie, as Victors in the former battel, were utterly broken and ſlaughtered by the Athenian Garriſons, and Megarians, to their great loſs and diſhonour.

Again, as the Athenians were diſcomfited near to Tangra, by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the ſuccour of the Dorians againſt the Phocians (at which time the Theſſalian horſemen turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought againſt them) ſo about threeſcore dayes after, the Athenians entred Bœotia under the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wan Phocis on the gulf of Oeteus, and evened the walls of Tenagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render upon moſt baſe conditions; as to beat down the walls of their City, and to give them hoſtages for Tribute; the ſiege whereof they had continued, notwithſtanding all their other brabbles and attempts elſewhere. Beſides theſe victories, they ſackt and ſpoiled many places upon the Sea-coaſt of Peloponneſus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians, wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their ſuccour. Theſe were the undertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of thoſe ſix years, that a part of their forces made War in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Theſſaly, perſwaded thereunto by Oreſtes, but were reſiſted by the King Pharſalus, who had chaſed Oreſtes out of his Dominions. They alſo landed in Sicyonia, and had victory over thoſe that reſiſted; after which they made truce with the Peloponneſians for five years, and ſent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ſhips; but they were again allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Mariſh and Woody parts of Egypt from the Perſians, to whom they ſent ſixty of their ſhips. The reſt of their Army failing in their enterpriſe at Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coaſted the Iſland, incountred a fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as alſo thoſe returned ſafe which were ſent into Egypt.

§. VI.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahaſhueroſh the Husband of Queen Heſter.

THeſe Egyptian troubles being ended, the reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable: whereof the length is by ſome reſtrained unto twenty years, but the more and better Authors give him forty, ſome allow unto him four and forty. He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleneſs. His favour was exceeding great to the Jews; as appeareth by the Hiſtories of Eſdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and ayd to that great work of building the Temple, it were a needleſs travel; conſidering that all the late Divines have taken very much pains to ſhew that thoſe two Prophets were licenſed by him, and ſuccoured in that building, in ſuch ſort as appears in their writings.

This was likewiſe that King Ahaſhueroſh who married Heſter. Whereof if it be needfull to give proof, it may ſuffice, that Ahaſhueroſh lived in Suſa, reigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore muſt have been a Perſian; That he lived in peace, as appears by the circumſtances of the Hiſtory, and uſed the counſel of the ſeven Princes, the authority of which Princes began under Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyſes.

The continual Wars which exerciſed King Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, together with the certainty of his marriages with ſundry ſundry wives, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his firſt wife Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus, alive in great honour, ſhe being mother to Xerxes the ſucceeding King, do manifeſtly prove that Heſter was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perſwaſion of Mardochæus, Jojachim the High Prieſt the ſon of Jeſua, cauſed the feaſt of Purim to be inſtituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Jojachim was in the reign of Artaxerxes, at the coming of Eſdras and Nehemias: Jeſua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The ſame continuance of wars with other his furious and tragical loves wherewith Xerxes did conſume ſuch little time as he had free from war, are enough to prove, that the ſtory of Heſter pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty years, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahaſuerus or Artaſaſtha is expreſſed by Nehemias. Again, it is well known that Xerxes in the ſeventh year of his reign (wherein this marriage muſt have been celebrated) came not near to Suſa. Of the Princes that ſucceeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahaſhueroſh, it is enough to ſay, that Mardochæus having been carried from Hieruſalem captive, with Jechonia, by Nabuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived until their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Suſa, reigned from India to Æthiopia, lived in peace, was contemporary with Jojachim the high Prieſt, and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that ſeventh year of his reign; which good fortune might well give occaſion to ſuch a Royal Feaſt, as is deſcribed in the beginning of Heſter. This is the ſumm of the arguments, brought to prove the age of Heſters ſtory by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who adds the authorities of Joſephus, affirming the ſame, and of Philo giving to Mardochæus eighteen years more than Iſaac the Patriarch lived, namely, one hundred fourſcore and eighteen years in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we ſuppoſe him to have been carried away captive, being a Boy of ten years old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponneſian War.

BUt it is fit that we now return to the affairs of the Greeks, who from this time forward, more vehemently proſecuting their civil wars, ſuffered the Perſians for many ages to reſt in peace: this Egyptian Expedition being come to nought. Soon after this, the Lacedæmonians undertook the war called Sacred; recovered the Temple and Iſle of Delphos, and delivered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the ſame, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the mean while the baniſhed Bœotians re-entred their own Land, & maſtered two of their own Towns poſſeſt by the Athenians, which they ſoon recovered again from them; but in their return towards Athens, the Bœotians, Eubœans, and Locrians (Nations oppreſt by the Athenians) ſet upon them with ſuch reſolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all ſlain or taken, whereby the Bœotians recovered their former liberty, reſtoring to the Athenians their priſoners. The Iſlanders of Eubœa took ſuch courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertiſed that the Megarians (who firſt left the Lacedæmonians, and ſubmitted themſelves to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had ſlain the Athenians Garriſons, and joyned themſelves with the Corinthians, Sycionians, and Epidaurians. Theſe news haſtened Pericles homeward with all poſſible ſpeed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponneſians, led by Pliſtoanax the ſon of Pauſanias, had invaded it, pillaged and burnt many parts thereof, after whoſe return Pericles went on with his firſt intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponneſians, and yielded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Countrey of Peloponneſus: and this truce was made for thirty years.

After ſix of theſe years were expired, the Athenians (favouring the Myleſians againſt the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles; and after many repulſes, and ſome great loſſes, both by Sea & Land, the Citizens were forced to yield up themſelves upon moſt lamentable conditions: Namely, to deliver up all their ſhips, to break down their own wals, to pay the charge of the war, and to reſtore whatſoever had been taken by themſelves, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the neck of which, followed that long and cruel Peloponnesian War, whereof I have gathered this Brief following: the same contention taking beginning fifty years after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no City thereof, which either in the beginning of this war, or in the continuance of it, was not drawn into the quarrell; I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countrey at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, upon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian War.

§. I.

Upon what terms the two principal Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood at the beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

GReece was never united under the Government of any one Prince or Estate, untill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to Union and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captains, than into any absolute subjection. For every Estate held their own, and were governed by Laws, far different, and by their own Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yield obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their Leaders in the Persian war (deemed the General quarrel of Greece) and took the profit and honour of the victory, to their own use and increase of greatness. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so far enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought under such obedience, as differed little from servitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with arms, and sometimes with gifts, preserve their liberty: of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chief; which two people deserved best the plague of tyranny, having first given occasion thereunto by their great ambition, which wearied and weakned all the Countrey by perpetual War. For, untill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gave beginning to the Peloponnesian War (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had overmastered all, forasmuch as every conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Country) the wars, commenced between one City of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controversies were soon decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the general Councel of Greece, or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aid was commonly held as good as the assurance of victory.

These Lacedæmonians had lived about four hundred years under one form of Government when the Peloponnesian War began. Their education was only to practise feats of Arms; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equal to very great numbers of any other people. They were poor, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equal portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintain him in such manner as they used. For bravery they had none, and curious building or apparel they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meals being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They used Money of Iron, whereof they could not be covetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian-like, save that they used no other occupation than War, placing all their felicity in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to pass that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they used mercenary Souldiers in their wars, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Islanders compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in form of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions natural, the difference between tween theſe two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, ſudden in their concluſions, and as haſty in the execution. The Lacedæmonians very ſlow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very reſolute, and ſuch as would in cold blood perform what the Athenians did uſually in flagrant. Whereby it came to paſs, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Eſtates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and aſſured, that ſought honour, and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by ſuch as obeyed them perforce, being held in ſtreight ſubjection. But the Signiory of the Athenians was nothing large, untill ſuch time as the Perſian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrel to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the Town of Athens could not be defended againſt his great Army of ſeventeen hundred thouſand men, beſtowed all their wealth upon a Navy, and (aſſiſted by the other Græcians) overthrew the Fleet of Xerxes, whoſe Land-forces were ſoon after diſcomfited by them, and the Greeks, who all ſerved under conduct of the Spartans. After theſe victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in Fleet, reduced all the Iſlands of the Greekiſh Seas under their obedience; impoſing upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War againſt the Perſian; though indeed they imployed their forces chiefly, to the conqueſt of ſuch Iſlands and Haven-Towns of their Countrey-men, as ſtood out againſt them. All which was eaſily ſuffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in Expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealouſie, and were very apt to quarrel with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Eſtates. Wherefore at ſuch time as the Thebans would have oppreſſed the Platæans, when they of Platæa repaired to Sparta for ſuccour, they found there no other aid, than this advice, That they ſhould ſeek help at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians ſhould be intangled in a long and tedious War with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwiſe; for their force was now ſo great, that all ſuch occaſions did only ſerve to encreaſe their honour and puiſſance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into War.

NEvertheleſs, many Eſtates of Greece were very ill-affected to Athens, becauſe that City grew very inſolent upon ſudden proſperity, and, maintaining the weaker Towns againſt the ſtronger, incroached apace upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Eſpecially the Corinthians were much inraged, becauſe the people of the Iſland Corcyra, their Colony which had rebelled againſt them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who deſired to increaſe their Fleet by adjoyning that of Corcyra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby defeated of that revenge, which elſe they would have taken. Now, howſoever it were ſo, that theſe dealings of the Athenians were not directly againſt the conditions of peace agreed upon among the Greeks, yet were the complaints made at Sparta ſo vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redreſs by war the injuries done to their Allies.

Firſt therefore, ſeeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed againſt the gods; whereto having for anſwer, That they themſelves ſhould expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they began to deal plainly, and required that the people of ſome Towns, oppreſſed by the State of Athens, ſhould be ſet at liberty; and that a decree made againſt thoſe of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, ſhould be reverſed. This laſt point they ſo earneſtly preſt, that if they might obtain it, they promiſed to abſiſt from their purpoſe of making War.

This they deſired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by ſeeming to have obtained ſomewhat, they might preſerve their reputation without entring into a War, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergo.

But the Athenians would yield to nothing; for it was their whole deſire that all Greece ſhould take notice how far they were from fear of any other City. Hereupon they prepared on both ſides very ſtrongly, all that was needful to the War; wherein the Lacedæmonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being aſſiſted by moſt of the Cities in Greece, and having the general favour, as men that pretended to ſet at liberty ſuch as were oppreſſed: but the Athenians did as far exceed them in all provisions of money, shipping, engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need, than the willing readiness of friends, who soon grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

Athenians

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

THE first and second years Expedition was very grievous to the City of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut down, the Country people driven to flye, with Wives, Children, and Cattel into the Town; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the City, such as before they had never felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the Isle of Lesbos, and the siege of Platæa their confederated City, which they durst not adventure to raise, besides some small overthrows received. The Lacedæmonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Country of Attica, and therein abide, until victuals began to fail, wasting and destroying all things round about. The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their enemies: but used to send a Fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their enemies, whilest they were making war in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Town of Platæa, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that War the Lacedæmonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deal with such enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to do any offence equal to such harm as they themselves might, and did, receive. The Confederates began to set forward very slowly in their Expeditions into Attica; perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Islands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these Invaders took but small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty City, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a pattern of the calamities with which their own Territory was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began to set their care to build a strong Navy, wherein they had little good success, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IV.

Of the great loss which the Spartans received at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they received at Pylus a very sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A Fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, wasting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the half-Isle of Peloponnesus, was by contrary winds detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory, joyning to the Main, by a strange neck of Land. Before it there lyes a small barren Island of less than two miles compass, and within that a Creek, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being born off by the head-Land and Isle. This Promontory the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificial fortification, was supplyed by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and haven, they in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Country adjoyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruel war with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subjection; yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the neer neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be revived. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedæmonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence make daily incursions into Laconia, which was not far off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haven, lying almost in the mid-way between them and Corcyra, make them able to surround all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The news of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few dayes before with their whole Army: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navy to recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well fore-saw, little fearing the grievous loſs at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vain made a general aſſault on all ſides, both by Sea and Land, finding that ſmall Garriſon which the Athenians had left, very reſolute in the defence, they occupied the haven, placing four hundred and twenty choice men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Iſland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channel that leads into the Port; but ſo narrow, that only two ſhips in front could enter between the Iſle and Pylus; likewiſe but ſeven or eight ſhips could enter at once by the further channel, between the Iſland and the Main. Having thus taken order to ſhut up this new Town by Sea, they ſent part of their Fleet to fetch wood, and other ſtuff, wherewith to fortifie round about, and block up the piece on all ſides. But in the mean ſeaſon the Athenian Fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the haven, did break and ſink many of their enemies veſſels; took five, and ſo inforced the reſidue to run themſelves aground.

Now was the Town ſecure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iſland as good as loſt. Wherefore the Magiſtrates were ſent from Sparta to the Camp (as was their cuſtom in great dangers) to adviſe what were beſt for the publick ſafety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to reſcue their Citizens out of the Iſle, than by compoſition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the mean while with the Captains at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedæmonians ſhould deliver up all the ſhips which were in the Coaſt, and that they ſhould attempt nothing againſt the Town, nor the Athenians againſt the Camp; That a certain quantity of Bread, Wine, and Fleſh, ſhould be daily carried into the Iſle, but that no ſhips ſhould paſs into the Iſland ſecretly: That the Athenians ſhould carry the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and ſhould bring them back, at whoſe return the truce ſhould end, which if in the mean time it were broken in any one point, ſhould be held utterly void in all; That when the truce was expired, the Athenians ſhould reſtore the Peloponneſian ſhips, in as good caſe as they received them. The Embaſſadors coming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themſelves had begun the War, ſo might they end it when they pleaſed. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did ſue to them for peace, adviſing them to make an end of War, whilſt with ſuch reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For inſtead of concluding upon even terms, or deſiring of meet recompence for loſs ſuſtained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be reſtored to them, which had been taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this War began, refuſing likewiſe to continue the treaty of peace, unleſs the Spartans which were in the Iſle, were firſt rendred unto them as priſoners. Thus were the Embaſſadors returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was deſired from the Athenian Captains, that they ſhould, according to their Covenant, reſtore the ſhips which had been put into their hands. Whereto anſwer was made, that the condition of the truce was, that if any one Article were broken, all ſhould be held void; now (ſaid the Athenians) ye have aſſaulted our Garriſons, and thereby are we acquitted of our promiſe to reſtore the ſhips. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer ſhifts; yet profit ſo far overweighed honour, that better anſwer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driven to uſe many hard means, for conveyance of victuals into the Iſle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried priſoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponneſians next invaded Attica, theſe priſoners ſhould all be ſlain. Whether fearing the death of theſe men, or withheld by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them, the Lacedæmonians were ſo far from waſting Attica, that they ſuffered their own Country to be continually over-run, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their Coaſt, and by thoſe which iſſued out of Pylus; which became the Rendezvous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

§. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great diſadvantage, obtained a Peace that was not well kept.

THerefore they endeavoured greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were ſo puffed up with continuance of good ſucceſs, that having ſent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Iſle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gain gain or loſs, they baniſhed the Captains, as if it had been meerly through their default, that the Iſle of Sicilie was not conquered; which (beſides the longer diſtance) was in power to offend others, or defend it ſelf, no whit inferiour unto Peloponneſus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated ſhortly after, by ſome diſaſters received, eſpecially in Thrace, where, in a battel which they loſt at Amphipolis, Cleon and Braſidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both ſlain; which two had moſt been adverſaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their loſſes were taught moderation; ſo the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Navy which they had received at Pylus, were fain to proceed lamely in the War, againſt ſuch as, through commodity of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were fervently deſirous to conclude the buſineſs, ere Fortune by any new favour ſhould revive the inſolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a conſideration of their preſent eſtate, that urged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and ſpeedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which unleſs they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoid. The eſtate of Argos, which had antient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their preſent troubles, by joyning with thoſe who alone found them work enough. Argos was a rich and ſtrong City, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not ſo unwarlike, nor held ſuch ill correſpondence with the neighbouring Eſtates, that the Lacedæmonians could ever far prevail upon it, when they had little elſe to do.

This was a thing that in the beginning of this War had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by waſting the Territory of Athens with ſword and fire, the quarrel ſhould eaſily and in ſhort time have been ended, whereby not only the Athenians ſhould have been brought to good order, but the Corinthians, and others, for whoſe ſake the War was undertaken, have been ſo firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of thoſe hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and means to raiſe more, were able to ſecure themſelves by a ſtrong fleet, from any great harm that the Peloponneſians, wanting wherewith to maintain a Navy, could do unto them; yea, as Maſters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither War nor peace; their daily travels, and many loſſes had ſo wearied and incenſed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to uſe the occaſion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a final peace, which with much ado they procured, as ſeemed equal and eaſie; but was indeed impoſſible to be performed, and therefore all their travel was little effectual.

The reſtitution of priſoners and places taken being agreed upon, it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould reſtore firſt. Theſe had won more Towns upon the Continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had won, they had not won abſolutely. For they had reſtored ſome Towns to ſuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; ſome, and thoſe the moſt, they had ſet at liberty (as reaſon required) which had opened their gates unto them as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as enemies. Now concerning the Towns which were not in their own hands, but had been rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found means to give ſome ſatisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the War; as for the reſt, they promiſed more than afterwards they could perform. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to hear of being abandoned, neither would they by any means yield themſelves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithſtanding whatſoever Articles were drawn, and concluded, for their ſecurity, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the ſide of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing thoſe things which on their part were required; ſo that reſtoring only the priſoners which they had, they deferred the reſt, untill ſuch time as they might receive the full ſatisfaction, according to the agreement. But before ſuch time as theſe difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrel, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more ſtreight alliance with the Athenians, making a league offenſive and defenſive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardneſs of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have ſued for peace peace at their hands, as ſoon as things were once compounded between Athens and Sparta, did ſhew themſelves plainly unwilling to give ear to any ſuch motion. Thinking therefore, that, by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian ſuccour, they ſhould make ſure work, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deſerving in the late War, or found ſo troubleſome, that their enmity (if perhaps they durſt let it appear) was little worſe than friendſhip. It bred great jealouſies in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive ſuch a conjunction between two ſo powerful Signiories: eſpecially one clauſe threatning every one, that was any thing apt to fear, with a ſecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of ſubduing the whole Country, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For, beſides the other Articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutual conſent add new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleaſures. This impreſſion wrought ſo ſtrongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had born to the Athenians their profeſſed enemies, was violently thrown upon the Lacedæmonians their unjuſt friends: whereby it came to paſs, that they who lately had born chief ſway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the diſcretion of their enemies, as already in effect they were, had the enemies wiſely uſed the advantage.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations and practices held between many States of Greece, by occaſion of the Peace that was concluded.

THE admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as unreſiſtable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been ſo exceſſive, that when by ſome ſiniſter accidents, that City was compelled to take and ſeek peace, upon terms not ſounding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens uſually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedæmonian would have endured to lay down his weapons, and yield himſelf priſoner, nor that any misfortune ſhould have been ſo great, as ſhould have drawn that City to relieve it ſelf otherwiſe than by force of Arms. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were ſome of eſpecial mark, being overlaid by enemies, in the Iſland before Pylus, had rather choſen to live in captivity, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it ſelf, ſticking as a thorn in the foot of Laconia, had bred ſuch anguiſh in that Eſtate, as utterly wearying the accuſtomed Spartan reſolution, had made it ſit down, and ſeek to refreſh it ſelf by diſhonourable eaſe: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive baſely of thoſe men which were vertuous, though unfortunate; but other leſs Cities joyning with theſe in the ſame opinion, did caſt their eyes upon the rich and great City of Argos, of whoſe ability to do much, they conceived a ſtrong belief, becauſe of long time it had done nothing. Such is the baſe condition, which through fooliſh envy is become almoſt natural in the greater part of mankind. We curiouſly ſearch into their vices, in whom, had they kept ſome diſtance, we ſhould have diſcerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriouſly our beſt parts with their worſt, are juſtly plagued with a falſe opinion of that good in ſtrangers, which we know to be wanting in our ſelves.

The firſt that publiſh'd their diſlike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whoſe vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envy at the greatneſs of Athens daily encreaſing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the preſent War. But theſe Corinthians did only murmur at the peace, alledging as grievances, that ſome Towns of theirs were left in the Atheneans hands. The Mantenæans, who during the time of War, had procured ſome part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forſake their dependency upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily diſcover themſelves; fear of revenge to come, working more effectually than indignation at things already paſt. The Argives feeling the gale of proſperous fortune that began to fill their ſails, prepared themſelves to take as much of it as they could ſtand under; giving for that purpoſe unto twelve of their Citizens a full and abſolute commiſſion to make alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular buſineſs to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were ſet thus open to all commers; the Mantinæans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponneſus following them, entred into this new confederacy; ſome incited by private reſpects, others thinking it the wiſeſt way to do as the moſt did. What inconveniency might ariſe unto them by theſe courſes, the Lacedæmonians eaſily diſcerned; & therefore ſent Embaſſadors to ſtop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the miſchief had been hatched. Theſe Embaſſadors found in the Corinthians a very rough diſpoſition, with a gravity expreſſing the opinion which they had conceived of their preſent advantage over Sparta. They had cauſed all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to ſend their Agents to them, in whoſe preſence they gave audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whoſe Embaſſie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forſake the alliance which they had long ſince made with Sparta; and that Reaſon did as well bind them to hold themſelves contented with the peace lately made, as Religion enforced them to continue in their antient confederacy; foraſmuch as it had been agreed between the Spartans and their aſſociats, that the conſent of the greater part (which had yielded unto peace with Athens) ſhould bind the leſſer number to perform what was concluded, if no Divine impediment withſtood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made anſwer, that the Spartans had firſt begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the war wherein they had loſt many places, without proviſion of reſtitution; and that the very clauſe alledged by the Embaſſadors, did acquit them from any neceſſity of ſubſcribing to the late Peace, foraſmuch as they had ſworn unto thoſe people whom they perſwaded to rebel againſt Athens, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly ſuffer them to fall again into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themſelves bound both in Reaſon and Religion to uſe all means of upholding thoſe, whom by common conſent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no leſs to be accounted a Divine impediment, than were peſtilence, tempeſt, or any the like accident, hindring the performance of things undertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they ſaid that they would do as they ſhould find cauſe. Having diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors with this anſwer, they made haſte to joyn themſelves with Argos, and cauſed other States to do the like; ſo that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themſelves, the Thebans and Megarians being alſo upon the point to have entred into this new confederacy. But as the affections were divers which cauſed this haſty confluence of ſudden friends to Argos, it ſo likewiſe came to paſs that the friendſhip it ſelf, ſuch as it was, had much diverſity both of ſincerity and of continuance. For ſome there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians, as the Mantineans and Eleans; theſe did firmly betake themſelves to the Argives, in whom they knew the ſame affection to be inveterate: others did only hate the peace concluded; and theſe would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in War, yet rather the Argives in War than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like unto themſelves, dealt with them to enter into the ſociety of the Argives, as they had done: but the different forms of Government, uſed in Thebes and Argos, cauſed the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principal men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joyning with ſuch as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This buſineſs having ill ſucceeded, the Corinthians began to bethink themſelves of their own danger, who had not ſo much as any truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for War. They ſought therefore to come to ſome temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one City that had ſhewed againſt them more ſtomach than force; but gave them to underſtand, that they might be ſafe enough from them, if they would claim the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted unto theſe Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themſelves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they deſired; but into private confederacy they would not admit them, being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one ſhould not make peace nor War without the other.

Herein, as in many other paſſages, may clearly be ſeen the great advantage which abſolute Lords have, as well in peace as in war, over ſuch as are ſerved by voluntaries. We ſhall hardly find any Signiory, that hath been ſo conſtantly followed as Sparta was by ſo many States, and ſome of them little inferior to it ſelf, being all as free: whereas contrariwiſe, the Athenians had lately, and by compulſive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themſelves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacy, and giving up ſuch places as were agreed upon: of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For ſuch Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be reſtored without their conſent which had them in preſent poſſeſſion; and particularly the Town of Panacte, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earneſtly deſired it, that by reſtitution thereof unto the Athenians as earneſtly demanding it, themſelves might recover Pylus) unleſs that they would agree to make a private alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were conſtrained to do, though knowing it to be contrary to the laſt agreement between them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one article of the league made between them & the Athenians, that by ſo doing they might enable themſelves to the performance of another, were ſhamefully diſappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the Town of Panacte, till firſt they had utterly demoliſhed it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was ſought to have been excuſed by the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors, who coming to Athens (whither they had ſent home all priſoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to ſalve the matter; ſaying, That from henceforth no enemy of Athens ſhould neſtle in Panacte, for it was deſtroyed. But theſe Embaſſadors had not to deal with tame fools. For the Athenians told them in plain terms, That of three principal conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one; but uſed ſuch baſe concluſions as ſtood not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thebans; having deſtroyed a Town that they ſhould have reſtored; and not having forced their dependants by War, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger thoſe that ſent them.

There were at that time both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, choſen for that year, in Sparta; & Alcibiades, a powerful young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though deſiring to renew the War, yet wiſhed that firſt they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendred to them by Covenant, eſpecially Pylus that had ſo ſorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whoſe Nobility, riches and favour with the people, made him deſire War, as the mean whereby himſelf might procure ſome honourable employment; uſed all means to ſet the quarrel on foot, whilſt the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendred ought ſave their priſoners, and pretence enough to uſe that advantage of breaking the peace, by reaſon that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed againſt their wills) had broken all Covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to perform nothing that the Lacedæmonians ſhould, and might require, until they had firſt, without any longer halting, fulfilled all Articles whereto they were bound, even to the utmoſt point. This was enough to make them ſweat, who having already done the moſt that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens, which were priſoners. But Alcibiades wiſhing a ſpeedy beginning of open war, ſent privily to the Argives, and gave them to underſtand how fitly the time ſerved for them to aſſociate themſelves with Athens, which was enough to give them ſecurity againſt all enemies.

The Argives, upon the firſt confluence of many Eſtates unto their ſociety, had embraced great hopes of working wonders as if they ſhould have had the conduct of all Greece againſt the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as having ill uſed it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in caſe of much contempt and diſability. But theſe ſudden apprehenſions of vain joy, were ſuddenly changed into as vain fear; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately been conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refuſed their alliance; when the Corinthians had ſought ſecurity from Athens; and when a falſe rumour was noiſed abroad, Athens Thebes and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of difference; then began the Argives to let fall their creſts, and ſue for peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their gravity, and were not over-haſty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the meſſage of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now conſulting how to become the chief of all others, but how to ſave themſelves. Wherefore they ſent away preſently to Athens, their own Embaſſadors, accompanied with the Mantinæans and Eleans, to make a league offenſive and defenſive between their Eſtates and the Athenians.

Of this buſineſs the Lacedæmonians knew not what to think: for well they ſaw, that ſuch a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were deſirous to prevent it; but to keep the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than ſtood with their honour or profit; others held it the wiſeſt way, having done ſo much, not to ſtick upon a little more, but rather by giving full ſatisfaction, to retain the friendſhip of that State, which was more to be valued than all the reſt of Greece. This reſolution prevailing, they ſent away ſuch of their Citizens as were beſt affected to the peace, who coming to Athens, with full commiſſion to make an end of all controverſies, did earneſtly labour in the Council-houſe, to make the truth of things appear, ſaying; That their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panacte: concerning which Town, or any other buſineſs, that it much grieved the Lacedæmonians, to ſee things fall out in ſuch wiſe as might give to the Athenians cauſe of diſpleaſure; but that all ſhould be done which in reaſon might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpoſe they ſhewed that themſelves had abſolute commiſſion. Wherefore they deſired that Pylus might be reſtored to them, and eſpecially for the preſent, that the negotiation with the Argives might be called aſide. Favourable audience was given to this propoſition, the rather, becauſe they which promiſed amends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good agreement was daſht on the ſudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, ſecretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors, perſwaded them well of his friendſhip towards their City, and adviſed them to take all care that their abſolute power to conclude what they pleaſed in the name of Sparta, might not be known to the Commonalty of Athens, leſt the inſolent multitude ſhould thereupon grow peremptory and yield to nothing, unleſs they could draw them to unreaſonable conditions. The Embaſſadors believed him, and faſhioned their tale in the aſſembly of the people, as he had adviſed them. Hereupon the ſame Alcibiades taking preſently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly againſt them, as men of no ſincerity, that were come to Athens for no other purpoſe, than to hinder the people from ſtrengthening themſelves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their own alliance, as (contrary to their own Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleaſing errand would very hardly have ſatisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whoſe honeſt meanings had ſo ill been ſeconded, with good performance) were now ſo much incenſed with the double dealing of the Embaſſadors, and the ſtrong perſwaſions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the preſent ſo far did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevail with them, that the buſineſs was put off, until he himſelf, with other Embaſſadours, might fetch a better anſwer from Sparta.

It may alſo ſeem a great wonder, how ſo poor a trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of ſo great importance, when the Spartan Embaſſadours might have caſt the load upon his own ſhoulders, by diſcovering the truth: But the gravity which was uſually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handſomely againſt ſo nimble a wit; and they might well have been thought untruſty men, had they profeſſed themſelves ſuch as would ſay and un-ſay for their moſt advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a ſowre meſſage to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the reſt, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould take the pains to rebuild Panacte, and ſhould immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them underſtand, that otherwiſe the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacy with the Argives, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forſake the Thebans, aſſured friends to their State; but wrought ſo hard, that the anger of the Athenians was ſuffered to break out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would do no more, than only (at the requeſt of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not ſeem to have effected nothing) ſwear a-new to keep the Articles of the league between him and Athens. Immediately therefore upon return of the Embaſſadors, a new league was made between the Athenians, Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample proviſion for holding the ſame common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were paſſed over with ſilence, yet was it manifeſt, that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it ſelf chiefly againſt them, as in ſhort while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill caſe, who having reſtored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to do the like, had themſelves recovered nothing of their own (priſoners excepted) for default of reſtoring all that they ſhould.

ſhould. But that which did moſt of all diſable them, was the loſs of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late War by misfortunes, than in ſundry paſſages between them and the Athenians: to procure and keep whoſe Amity, they had left ſundry of their own friends to ſhift for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, the Athenians by the treaty of peace, had recovered the moſt part of that which they loſt in War; all their gettings they had retained; and were ſtrengthened by the acceſs of new Confederates.

How the Peace between Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellows had found buſineſs wherewith to ſet the Athenians on work, and make uſe of this conjunction. For, preſuming upon the ſtrength of their ſide, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hoſtility were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infeſt each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their ſeveral friends.

By theſe occaſions the Corinthians, Bœotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, began a-new to range themſelves under the Lacedæmonians, and follow their enſigns. One victory which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meer valour in a ſet Battel, near to Mantinæa, againſt the Argive ſide, helped well to repair their decayed reputation, though otherwiſe it yielded them no great profit. The civil diſſention ariſing ſhortly after within Argos it ſelf, between the principal Citizens, and the Commons, had almoſt thrown down the whole frame of the new combination. For the chief Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded ſo far, as to renounce the Amity of the Athenians in expreſs words, and forced the Mantinæans to the like. But in ſhort ſpace of time the multitude prevailing, reverſed all this, and having chaſed away their ambitious Nobility, applied themſelves to the Athenians as cloſely as before.

Beſides theſe uproars in Peloponneſus, many aſſaies were made to raiſe up troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewiſe in Macedon, to the Athenians; whoſe forces and readineſs for execution, prevented ſome things, revenged other, and requited all with ſome proſperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrel, and the Lacedæmonians growing weary, they began to be quiet; retaining ſtill that enmity in their hearts, which they had ſufficiently diſcovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open War.

§. VIII.

The Athenians ſending two Fleets to ſack Syracuſe, are put to flight, and utterly diſcomfited.

DUring this intermiſſion of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of ſubduing Sicil; whither they ſent a Fleet ſo mighty, as never was ſet forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furniſhed with all neceſſaries to ſo great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades, Author of that voyage, and one of the Generals of their Fleet, was driven to baniſh himſelf, for fear of ſuch judgement, as elſe he was like to have undergone among the incenſed people; partly by the invaſion which the Lacedæmonians made upon Attica, whilſt the forces of that State were ſo far from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Perſia, who ſupplied the Peloponneſians with mony.

Neither was the ſucceſs of things in Sicilia ſuch, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that War. For, although in the beginning, the enterprize had ſo well ſucceeded, that they beſieged Syracuſe, the chief City of all the Iſland, and one of the faireſt Towns which the Greeks inhabited, obtaining the better in ſundry Battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with ſtrong aid from Peloponneſus, it came to paſs that the Athenians were put to the worſe on all ſides, in ſuch wiſe, that their Fleet was ſhut up into the haven of Syracuſe, and could not iſſue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very ill in Sicil, ſo did they at home ſtand upon their terms; for that the Lacedæmonians, who had been formerly accuſtomed to make weariſome yearly journeys into Attica, which having pillaged and forraged, they returned home; did now by counſel of Alcibiades (who ſeeking revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortifie the Town of Decelea, which was near to Athens, whence they ceaſed not with daily incurſions to harry all the Country round about, and ſometimes give alarm unto the City it ſelf.

In

In these extremities, the perverse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange; who leaving at their backs, & at their own doors, an enemy little less mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another Fleet into Sicil, to invade a people no less puissant, which had never offended them.

It often happens, that a prosperous event makes foolish counsel seem wiser than it was; which came to pass many times among the Athenians, whose vain Conceits Pallas was said to turn to the best. But where unsound advice, finding bad proof, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have served to convey home the former that was defeated, after some attempts made to small purpose against the Syracusans, was finally (together with the other part of the Navy, which was there before) quite vanquished, and barr'd up into the haven of Syracuse, whereby the Camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driven to break up, and fly away by Land; in which flight they were over-taken, routed, and quite overthrown, in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischief well deserved, fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pthiodorus Generals, formerly sent into that Isle, pretending that they had taken mony for making peace in Sicil, whereas indeed there was not any means or possibility to have made War. Hereby it came to pass, that Nicias; who had the chief command in this unhappy enterprize, did rather chuse to hazard the ruine of his Country by the loss of that Army, wherein consisted little less than all the power of Athens; than to adventure his own estate, his life, and his honour, upon the tongues of shameless accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his tryal resolved to condemn him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdom and necessity required it. For (said he) they shall give sentence upon us, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would give ear to any that would speak in our behalf, but altogether hearken to suspicious and vain rumours that shall be brought against us: yea these our souldiers, who now are so desirous to return in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man, to do what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth; and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the injustice of his people, and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patern whereby oppression beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his fear of wrongful condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily have over-mastered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dis-lodge, that he would not consent to have the Camp break up till seven and twenty daies were past. His timerousness was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the powers of the Heavens, and the course of Nature would be as unjust as his Athenians; or might portend less evil to the slothful, than to such as did their best. Neither do I think that any Astrologers can alledge this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turn it to their own confusion. Had C. Cassius the Roman, he who slew Julius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retiring, the broken remainder of Crassus his Army, defeated by the Parthian Archers, was advised, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sun were past the sign of Scorpio; he made answer, that he stood not in such fear of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon Earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a fair example to that good rule,

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of means, deprives the Governours of understanding, when he intends evil to the Multitude; and that the wickedness of unjust men is the ready mean to weaken the virtue of those who might have done them good.

Of the troubles whereinto the State of Athens fell, after the great loſs of the Fleet and Army in Sicilia.

THe loſs of this Army was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little leſs calamity to that Eſtate, than was the ſubverſion of the walls, when the City about ſeven years after was taken by Lyſander. For now began the ſubjects of the Athenian Eſtate to rebel: of whom, ſome they reduced under their obedience, others held out; ſome for fear of greater inconvenience were ſet at liberty promiſing only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kinde of liberty offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect liberty by force. Among theſe troubles it fell out very unſeaſonably, that the principal men of Athens, being wearied with the peoples inſolency, took upon them to change the form of that Eſtate, and bring the Government into the hands of a few. To which purpoſe, conſpiring with the Captains which were abroad, they cauſed them to ſet up the form of an Ariſtocracy in the Towns of their Confederates; and in the mean time, ſome that were moſt likely to withſtand this Innovation, being ſlain at Athens, the Commonalty were ſo diſmaid, that none durſt ſpeak againſt the Conſpirators, whoſe number they knew not, but every man was afraid of his neighbour, leſt he ſhould be a member of the league. In this general fear the Majeſty of Athens was uſurped by four hundred men, who obſerving in ſhew the ancient form of proceeding, did cauſe all matters to be propounded unto the people, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were only ſuch as were firſt allowed in private among themſelves; neither had the Commonalty any other liberty, than only to approve and give conſent: for whoſoever preſumed any further, was quickly diſpatched out of the way, and no enquiry made of the murther. By theſe means were many Decrees made, all tending to the eſtabliſhment of this new authority, which nevertheleſs endured not long. For the Fleet and Army which then was in the Iſle of Samos, did altogether deteſt theſe dealings of the four hundred uſurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of baniſhment, and by his aſſiſtance procured that the ſupplies which the Perſian King had promiſed to the Lacedæmonians, were by Tiſſaphernes, his Lieutenant, made unprofitable, through the ſlow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the firſt been very well entertained in Sparta, whilſt his ſervice done unto that State, was not grown to be the object of envy. But when it appeared that in Counſel and good performance he ſo far excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good ſucceſs was aſcribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principal Citizens weary of his virtue; eſpecially Agis one of their Kings, whoſe wife had ſo far yielded her ſelf to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward friends ſhe could not forbear to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades ſhould be killed out of the way. But he diſcovering the Spartan treachery, conveyed himſelf unto Tiſſaphernes, whom he ſo bewitched with his great beauty, ſweet converſation, and ſound wit, that he ſoon became the Maſter of that barbarous Viceroys affections, who had free power to diſpoſe the great Kings Treaſures and Forces in thoſe parts. Then began he to adviſe Tiſſaphernes; not ſo far forth to aſſiſt the Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to help the weaker ſide, and let them one conſume another, whereby all ſhould fall at length into the hands of the Perſian. By this counſel he made way to other practices, wherein by ſtrength of his reputation (as the only Favorite of ſo great a Potentate) he played his own game, procuring his reſtitution. At length his baniſhment being repealed by the Army, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppreſſed by the four hundred) he laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at leaſt to divert their heat another way, and turn it upon the common Enemy. Some of the four hundred approved his motion, as being weary of the tyranny whereof they were partakers, partly becauſe they ſaw it could not long endure, & partly for that themſelves, being leſs regarded by the reſt of their companions, than ſtood with their good liking, ſought to acquit themſelves of it as honeſtly as they might. But the moſt of that Faction laboured to obtain peace of the Lacedæmonians, deſiring chiefly to maintain both their own authority, and the greatneſs of their City, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wiſh to preſerve their own power, or ſafety at leaſt, than the good Eſtate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made ſundry overtures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, deſiring to compound in as good terms terms as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be truſted, than the wavering multitude; eſpecially conſidering that the City of Sparta was governed by an Ariſtocracy, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All theſe paſſages between the four hundred (or the moſt and chief of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as ſecret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping, without any great cauſe, to repair their loſſes, was not inclined to make compoſition; from which upon juſter ground the Enemy was much more averſe, truſting well that the diſcord of the Athenians (not unknown abroad) might yield ſome fair opportunity to the deſtruction of it ſelf, which in effect (though not then preſently) came to paſs. And upon this hope King Agis did ſometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received ſome ſmall loſſes. Likewiſe the Navy of Peloponneſus made ſhew of attempting the City, but ſeeing no likelihood of ſucceſs, they bent their courſe from thence to other places, where they obtained Victories, which in the better fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have been regarded, than in this their decayed eſtate. Yet it ſeems, without any diſparagement to their wiſdom, they ſhould rather have forborn to preſent unto the City, or to the Countries near adjoyning, any terror of the War. For the diſſention within the walls might ſoon have done more good than could be received from the Fleet or Army without, which indeed gave occaſion to ſet the Citizens at unity, though it laſted not very long. The four hundred, by means of theſe troubles, were fain to reſign their authority, which they could not now hold, when the people, having taken arms to repel forein Enemies, would not lay them down, till they had freed themſelves from ſuch as oppreſſed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of Government a full reſtitution of the ſovereign command unto the people, or whole body of the City, but onely to five thouſand; which company the four hundred (when their authority began) had pretended to take unto them as aſſiſtants: herein ſeeming to do little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who ſeldom aſſembled in greater number. But now when the higheſt power was come indeed into the hands of ſo many, it was ſoon agreed, that Alcibiades and his companions ſhould be recalled from exile, and that the Army at Samos ſhould be requeſted to undertake the Government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers deſire.

How Alcibiades won many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their General, and again depoſed.

THis eſtabliſhment of things in the City, was accompanied with ſome good ſucceſs in the Wars. For the Lacedæmonians were about the ſame time overthrown at Sea, in a great Battel, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning ſuch forces as he could raiſe, obtained many Victories. Before the Town of Abydus, his arrival with eighteen ſhips, gave the honour of a great Battel to the Athenians; he overthrew and utterly deſtroyed the Fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ranſome their City, and fortified Chryſopolis. Hereupon Letters were ſent to Sparta, which the Athenians intercepting, found to contain the diſtreſs of the Army, in theſe few words: All is loſt; Mindarus is ſlain; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to do.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedæmonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, beſieged and won Byzantium, now called Conſtantinople, which even in thoſe days was a goodly, rich, and very ſtrong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made High Admiral of all the Navy.

But this his honour continued not long, for it was taken from him, and he driven to baniſh himſelf again, only becauſe his Lieutenant, contrary to the expreſs command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his abſence, had loſt a great part of the Fleet.

The ſecond baniſhment of Alcibiades, was to the Athenians more harmful than the firſt; and the loſs which thereupon they received, was (though more heavy to them, yet) leſs to be pitied of others, than that which enſued upon his former exile. For, whereas at the firſt, he had ſought revenge upon his own City; now, as inured to adverſity, he rather pitied their fury, who in time of ſuch danger, had caſt out him that ſhould have repaired their weak eſtate, than ſought by procuring or beholding the calamity of his people, to comfort himſelf after injury received. Before they, who were inſtituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the Fleet, he preſented Battel to Lyſander the Lacedæmonian Admiral, who was not ſo confident upon his former Victory, as to undertake Alcibiades himſelf, bringing ſhips more in number (notwithſtanding the former loſs of fifteen) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had been under his Lieutenant. But when the Decree of the people was publiſhed in the Navy, then did Alcibiades withdraw himſelf to a Town upon Helleſpont, called Bizanthe, where he had built a Caſtle.

§. XI.

The Battel of Arginuſæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captains by the people.

After this time, the Athenians receiving many loſſes and diſcomfitures, were driven to fly into the Haven of Mytelene, where they were ſtraitly beſieged both by Land and Sea. For the raiſing of this ſiege, neceſſity inforced them to man all their veſſels, and to put the uttermoſt of their forces into the hazard of one Battel. This Battel was fought at Arginuſæ, where Callicratidas, Admiral of the Lacedæmonains, loſing the honour of the day, preſerved his own reputation, by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well have been expected, that the ten Captains, who joyntly had command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, ſhould for that good daies ſervice, and ſo happy a Victory, have received great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwiſe, they were forthwith called home, and accuſed, as if wilfully they had ſuffered many of the Citizens, whoſe ſhips were broken and ſunk, to be caſt away, when by appointing ſome Veſſels to take them up, they might have ſaved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very juſt anſwer, That they purſuing the Victory, had left part of the Fleet, under ſufficient men, to ſave thoſe that were wrackt; which if it were not well accompliſhed, it was, becauſe a tempeſt ariſing about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuſe availed not. For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who ſaid, That he himſelf eſcaping in a Meal-tub, had been intreated by thoſe who were in peril of drowning, to deſire of the people revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very ſtrange, that upon ſuch an accuſation maintained with ſo ſlender evidence, men that had well deſerved of their Country ſhould be overthrown. But their enemies had ſo incenſed the raſcal multitude, that no man durſt abſolve them, ſave only Socrates the wiſe and virtuous Philoſopher, whoſe voice in this judgement was not regarded. Six of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly eſcaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other Veſſels in the ſtorm: but the Captains which were abſent eſcaped; for when the fury of the people was over-paſt, this judgement was reverſed, and the accuſers called into queſtion for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themſelves from the infamy of injuſtice, but the divine Juſtice was not aſleep, nor would be ſo deluded.

§. XII.

The Battel at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponneſian War.

THE Peloponneſian Fleet under Lyſander, the year next following, having ſcoured the Ægean Seas, enter Helleſpont, where (landing Souldiers) it beſieged and took the Town of Lampſacus. Hereupon all the Navy of Athens, being an hundred and fourſcore ſail, made thither in haſte: but finding Lampſacus taken before their coming, they put in at Seſtos, where having refreſhed themſelves, they ſailed to the River called Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the River of the Goat, being on the Continent oppoſite to Lampſacus: and there they caſt Anchors, not one whole league off from Lyſander, who rode at Lampſacus in the harbor. The next day after their arrival, they preſented fight unto the Pelopponneſians, who refuſed it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Ægos-Potamos; and thus they continued five daies, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own harbour when it drew towards evening.

The Caſtle of Alcibiades was not far from the Navy, and his power in thoſe places was ſuch as might have greatly availed his Country-men, if they could have made uſe of it. For he had waged mercenaries, and making war in his own name upon ſome people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the diſorderly courſe of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, and ſhewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not ſoon fore-ſee and prevent it. For they lay in a rode ſubject to every weather; neither near enough to any Town where they might furniſh themſelves with neceſſaries, nor so far off as had been more expedient. Sestos was the next Market-town; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Navy every day, as soon as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lye at Sestos, which was not far off, or at least to consider how near their Enemy was, whose fear proceeded rather from obedience to their General, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so far despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his authority was out of date. Had it not been for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedæmonians, either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might so have done by transporting the light-armed Thracians, his confederates, and others his followers, over the Streights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leave their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsel no better than hath been rehearsed, he left them to their fortune; which how evil it would be, he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himself by the advantage of his Haven, was not careless in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was, to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who observing their doings, related unto him what they had seen. Therefore understanding in what careless fashion they romed up and down the Country; he kept all his men aboard after their departure: and the fifth day gave especial charge to his Scouts, that when they perceived the Athenians dis-imbarking, as their custom was, and walking towards Sestos, they should forthwith return, and hang up a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readiness, made all speed that strength of Oars could give, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies aboard their ships, nor many near them, and all in great confusion upon the news of his approach.

Insomuch that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that loss imported, gave over Athens as desperate, & made a long flight into the Isle of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came into the rescue, cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seven and twenty years, with variable success, concluded in one hour, and the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that she never afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this Victory, Lysander, having taken such Towns as readily did yield upon the first fame of his exploit, set sail for Athens, and joyning his forces with those of Agis and Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the City; which finding too stubborn to yield, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth again to Sea, and rather by terror than violence, compelled all the Islands, and such Towns of the Ionians as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all provision of victuals, and other necessaries, from the City, and inforced the people by meer famine to yield to these conditions; That the long walls, leading from the Town to the Port, should be thrown down; That all Cities subject to their Estate, should be set at liberty: That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the fields adjoyning to their Town; And that they should keep no more than twelve ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the wars.

These Articles being agreed upon, the walls were thrown down with great rejoycing of those who had born displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the City, and laying waste the land about it. Which advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governors, or rather cruel Tyrants, appointed over the people, who recompenced their former insolency and injustice over their Captains, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slavery.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repair what their own folly had ruined. But the Thirty Tyrants perceiving this, advertised the Lacedæmonians thereof, who contrived, and (as now domineering in every quarter) soon effected his sudden death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian war. After which the Lacedæmonians abusing the reputation and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, and by combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authority, even in that very age in which they they had ſubdued Athens. The greateſt foil that they took, was of the Thebans led by Epaminondas, under whom Philip of Macedon Father to Alexander the Great, had the beſt of his education. By theſe Thebans, the City of Sparta (beſides other great loſſes received) was ſundry times in danger of being taken. But theſe haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the ſeveral Eſtates and Signiories of Greece, were grown ſo jealous one of anothers greatneſs, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argives, and Thebans, which were the mightieſt, aſſociating themſelves with the weaker party, did ſo counterpoize the ſtronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her juriſdiction ſo far as might make her terrible to her neighbours. And thus all parts of the Country remained rather evenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till ſuch time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whoſe fore-fathers had been dependants, and followers, yea almoſt meer Vaſſals to the Eſtates of Athens and Sparta) found means, by making uſe of their factions, to bring them all into ſervitude, from which they never could be free; till the Romans preſenting them with a ſhew of liberty, did themſelves indeed become their Maſters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponneſian War, or ſhortly following it.

§. I.

How the affairs of Perſia ſtood in thoſe times.

DUring the times of this Peloponneſian War, and thoſe other leſs Expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably enjoyed a long reign over the Perſians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Baſtard, whom the Greek Hiſtorians (lightly paſſing over Xerxes the ſecond, and Sogdianus, as Uſurpers, and for their ſhort reign little to be regarded) place next unto them, or to Xerxes the ſecond; who, and his Brother Sogdianus after him (ſeeming to have been the Sons of Heſter) held the Kingdom but one year between them; the younger ſucceeding his elder Brother. It is not my purpoſe (as I have ſaid before) to purſue the Hiſtory of the Perſians from henceforth, by rehearſal of all the particulars, otherwiſe than as they ſhall be incident to the affairs of Greece. It may therefore ſuffice to ſay, That Xerxes the ſecond, being a vicious Prince, did periſh after a month or two, if not by ſurfeit, then by the treachery of his riotous Brother Sogdianus. Likewiſe of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his Brother, and more cruel, he ſlew unjuſtly Bagorazus a principal Eunuch, and would have done as much to his Brother Darius the Baſtard, had not he fore-ſeen it, and by raiſing a ſtronger Army than this hated King Sogdianus could leavy, ſeized at once upon the King and Kingdom. Darius having ſlain his Brother, held the Empire nineteen years. Amyrtæus of Sais an Egyptian, rebelled againſt him, and having partly ſlain, partly chaſed out of the Land the Perſian Garriſons, allied himſelf ſo firmly with the Greeks, that by their aid he maintained the Kingdom, and delivered it over to his poſterity, who (notwithſtanding the fury of their civil Wars) maintained it againſt the Perſian, all the daies of this Darius, and of his Son Artaxerxes, Mnemon. Likewiſe Amorges, a ſubject of his own, and of the Royal blood, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled againſt him; confederating himſelf with the Athenians. But the great calamity, before ſpoken of, which fell upon the Athenians in Sicil, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Iſlanders and others, ſubject to the State of Athens, to ſhake off the yoke of their long continued bondage; It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedæmonians being deſtitute of mony, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Navy, without which it was impoſſible to advance the War againſt the State of Athens, that remained powerful by Sea, were driven to crave his aſſiſtance, which he granted unto them, firſt upon what conditions beſt pleaſed himſelf, though afterwards the Articles of the league between him and them, were ſet down in more preciſe terms; wherein it was concluded, That he and they ſhould make war joyntly upon the Athenians, and upon all that ſhould rebel from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Aſia which had formerly been his, or his Predeceſſors, ſhould return to his obedience. By this Treaty, and the War enſuing (of which I have already ſpoken) he recovered all that his Grandfather and Father had loſt in Aſia. Likewiſe by aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians, he got Amorges alive into his hands, who was taken in the City of Jaſus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to ſuccour him. Nevertheleſs Egypt ſtill held out againſt him; the cauſe whereof cannot be the employment of the Perſian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occaſions, but they wanted manhood, which cauſed him to fight with gold; which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his natural enemies, what the valour of his own Subjects was inſufficient to perform. Darius had in marriage Paryſatis his own Siſter, who bare unto him (beſides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to ſay, the Mindful, or the Remembrer, who ſucceeded him in the Kingdom; and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of ſingular virtue, and accounted, by all that knew him, the moſt excellent man that ever Perſia bred after Cyrus the great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave unto his eldeſt Son Artaxerxes the inheritance of the great Empire, did caſt a jealous eye upon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Aſia, took more upon him than befitted a Subject: for which cauſe his Father ſent for him, with intent to have taken ſome very ſharp courſe with him, had not his own death prevented the coming of his younger Son, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the war between theſe Brethren, and ſummarily of Artaxerxes, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak ſomewhat in more convenient place.

§. II.

How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place very convenient to ſhew the proceedings of the Greeks, after the ſubverſion of the walls of Athens, which gave end to that War called the Peloponneſian War, but could not free the unhappy Country of Greece from civil broils. The thirty Governours, commonly called the thirty Tyrants of Athens, were choſen at the firſt by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of ſuch ancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the City ſtanding as it did in that ſo ſudden alteration. To this charge was annexed the ſupreme authority, either as a recompenſe of their labours, or becauſe the neceſſity of the times did ſo require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that ſuch men ſhould give judgement in particular cauſes, to whoſe judgement the Laws themſelves, by which the City was to be ordered, were become ſubject. But theſe thirty, having ſo great power in their hands, were more careful to hold it, than to deſerve it by faithful execution of that which was committed to them in truſt.

Therefore apprehending ſuch troubleſome fellows as were odious to the City, though not puniſhable therefore by Law; they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who conſidered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethink themſelves, how eaſie a thing it would be unto theſe thirty men, to take away the lives of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what elſe they liſted, when condemnation without true trial and proof had been once well allowed. Having thus plauſibly entred into a wicked courſe of Government, they thought it beſt to fortifie themſelves with a ſure guard, ere they brake out into thoſe diſorders, which they muſt needs commit for the eſtabliſhing of their authority. Wherefore diſpatching two of their own company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the Thirty, to keep the City free from all rebellious motions: to which purpoſe it behoved them to cut off ſuch as were ſeditious, and therefore deſired the Lacedæmonians to ſend them a Garriſon, which they promiſed at their own coſt to maintain. This motion was well approved, and a Guard ſent, the Captain of which was ſo well intertain'd by the Thirty, that none of their miſdeeds could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after baſe and deteſted perſons, invaded the principal men of the City, ſending armed men from houſe to houſe, who drew out ſuch as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head againſt this wicked form of Government: whereby there was ſuch effuſion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the Thirty) ſeemed very horrible, and unable to eſcape vengeance. His diſlike of their proceedings being openly diſcovered, cauſed his fellows to bethink themſelves themselves, and provide for their own security, and his destruction, lest he should make himself a Captain of the discontented (which were almost the whole City) and redeem his own peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gave unto them some part of the publick authority, the rest they disarmed; and having thus increased their own strength, and weakned their opposites, they began a-fresh to shed the blood, not only of their private enemies, but of such whose mony, or goods, might inrich them, and enable them for the payment of their Guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, upon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirty was most tyrannical, accuse him to the Council, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one main priviledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirty, but have the accustomed tryal) he took upon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes and so reduced him under the trial and sentence of that order. It was well alledged by Theramenes that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the catalogue, than any other mans; upon which consideration, he advised them all to conceive no otherwise of his case, than as of their own, who were liable to the same form of proceeding: but every man chusing rather to preserve his own life by silence, than presently to draw upon himself the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would never come near him; the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drink poyson.

§. III.

The Conspiracy against the thirty Tyrants, and their deposing.

After the death of Theramenes, the thirty began to use such out-rage, as excelled their former villanies. For, having three thousand (as they thought) firm unto them, they robbed all others without fear or shame, despoiling them of lands and goods, and caused them to fly into banishment, for safeguard of their lives. This flight of the Citizens procured their liberty, and the generall good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resolved to hazard their lives in setting free the City of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventy men, or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Captain Thrasybulus took Phyla, a place of strength in the Territory of Athens. No sooner did the thirty hear of their exploit, than seek means to prevent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedæmonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some loss of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormy weather, against which they had not made provision. Retiring therefore to the City which above all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of horse, to weary out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasybulus were increased from seventy to seven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon those guards, of whom they cut off above an hundred and twenty. These small but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburb of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their coming the thirty had resolved to fortifie the Town of Eleusine, to their own use, whereinto they might make an easie retrait, and save themselves from any sudden peril. It may well seem strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of Government had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtain mens good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could bear arms into their hands by a train, and wickedly (though under form of Justice) murthered them all. But, Sceleribus tutam per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of safety, than by extending their cruelty unto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellows, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed again by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this interprize Thrasybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom though there were slain to the number of seventy only, yet the Victory seemed the greater, greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations used by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirty were deposed. Nevertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharp account, that no peace, nor quiet form of Government could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aid against Thrasybulus and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power sent to their assistance, both by land and sea, under the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Army of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared first the jealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians and Corinthians, who in the late wars had been the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alledging that it stood not with their oaths, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing indeed, lest the Lacedæmonians should annex the Territory of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to cross the proceedings of Lysander, whom he envied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of war, he finally wrought such means, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirty men, and such others as were like to give cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannical faction, having withdrawn themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innovation; whereupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captains, as they were coming to Parly, and slew them: which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the City returned to her former quietness.

CHAP. X.

Of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his Brother.

THE matters of Greece standing upon such terms, that no one Estate durst oppose it self against that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes King of Persia, having in his Fathers life-time very carefully prosecuted the War against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appear no less to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous War against the Athenians. To this request, being general, the Lacedæmonians gave a suitable answer; commanding the Admiral to perform unto Cyrus all service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdom of Persia should have been the recompence of his deserts; or that, he perishing in battel, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew unto the Greeks the wayes, which under the Macedonian Ensigns, the victorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; and opening unto them the riches, and withal the weakness of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that Conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mighty Kingdom, whose hour was not yet come. The love which Parysatis the Queen-mother of Persia bare unto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest favour of the people, and ready desires of many principal men, had moved this young Prince, in his Fathers old age, to aspire after the Succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before been shewed) whose meaning was to curb this ambitious Youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes taxerxes eſtabliſhed ſo ſurely by the old Kings favour, that it were not ſafe to attempt any means of diſplanting him, by whoſe diſfavour himſelf might eaſily loſe the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Aſia the leſs, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The neareſt neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Aſia, was Tiſſaphernes, a man compounded of cowardiſe, treachery, craft, and all vices which accuſtomably branch out of theſe. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, uſing by the way all fair ſhews of friendſhip, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queen Paryſatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Paryſatis had uſed the beſt of her endeavour to that purpoſe, alledging that (which in former ages had been much available to Xerxes, in the like diſceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilſt his Father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was crowned King. All which not ſufficing; when the moſt that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of ſome preſumptuous demeanor, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoyning: then did this Tiſſaphernes diſcover his nature, and accuſe his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treaſon intended againſt his perſon. Upon this accuſation, whether true or falſe, very eaſily believed, Cyrus was arreſted, and by the moſt vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly delivered, and ſent back into his own Province.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his firſt entry into the War.

THE form of Government which the Perſian Lieutenants uſed in their ſeveral Provinces, was in many points almoſt Regal. For they made war and peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoof, but for their own reputation; uſually indeed with the Kings enemies, yet ſometimes one with another: which was the more eaſily tolerated, becauſe their own heads were held only at the Kings pleaſure, which cauſed them to frame all their doings to his will, what ſoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being ſetled in Lydia, began to conſider with himſelf, the intereſt that he had in the Kingdom; the ſmall aſſurance of his Brothers love, held only by his Mothers interceſſion; the diſgrace endured by his late impriſonment; and the means which he had by love of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtain the Crown for himſelf. Neither was it expedient that he ſhould long ſit idle, as waiting till occaſion ſhould preſent it ſelf: but rather enterpriſe ſomewhat whilſt yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worſe than only queſtionable. Hereupon he firſt began to quarrel with Tiſſaphernes, and ſeized upon many Towns of his Juriſdiction, annexing them to his own Province, which diſpleaſed not Artaxerxes at all, who (beſides that he was of condition ſomewhat ſimple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accuſtomable Tributes out of thoſe places, was well contented to ſee his brothers hot ſpirit exerciſed in private quarrels. But Tiſſaphernes, whoſe baſe conditions were hated, and cowardiſe deſpiſed, although he durſt not adventure to take arms againſt Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Mileſians were about to give up themſelves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other Towns of the Ionians had done, thought by terror to preſerve his reputation, and keep the Town in his own hands. Wherefore he ſlew many, and many he baniſhed, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing fair occaſion to take arms, which was no ſmall part of his deſire. In levying Souldiers he uſed great policy; for he took not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countries adjoyning, whoſe lives were ready at his will; but ſecretly he furniſhed ſome Grecian Captains with money, who being very good men of War, entertained Souldiers therewith, ſome of them warring in Thrace, others in Theſſaly, others elſewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to croſs the Seas, at the firſt call of Cyrus, till which time they had ſecret inſtructions to prolong their ſeveral Wars, that the Souldiers might be held in continual exerciſe, and ready in arms upon the ſudden. Cyrus having ſent a power of men to beſiege Miletus, forthwith ſummoned theſe bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his aſſiſtance, being thirteen thouſand very firm Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almoſt incredible) againſt the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he had levied before, he could very eaſily have forced Miletus, and chaſed away Tiſſaphernes out of Aſia the leſs: but his purpoſe was not ſo to loſe time in ſmall matters; that was to be imployed in the accompliſhment of higher deſigns. Pretending therefore that the the Pisidians, a people of Asia the less, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territory; he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoyce that Cyrus had left him to himself, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up to his Brother.

THe tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilst the King in great fear was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger hasted upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his number much increased by the repair of his Countrey-men, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by tryal in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cicilia, who had brought him aid) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Camp (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled a-main, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their Cabins, and running all away for very fear. This was to Cyrus a joyful spectacle, who knew very well, that his Brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, because they were prest to the war against their will and dispositions, whereas his Army was drawn along by meer affection and good will. Nevertheless he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greeks to pass the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had trodden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious return. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cicilia, to seek excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principal Captains, and his own great enemy, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such devices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates; where some of the Greeks considering, That who so passed the River first, should have the most thanks, and might safely return if the rest should refuse to follow them; they entred the Foords, whereby all were finally perswaded to do as some had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seek out Artaxerxes, wheresoever he was to be found. The King in the mean time having raised an Army of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in trial of a plain battel. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men, had undertaken to make good the Streights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature and art, which made the place to seem impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself toward the Kings forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face; who despairing to find any way by Land, had procured the Lacedæmonian Fleet, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Army. I do not find that this cowardise of Abrocomas, or his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Camp, till five dayes were past after the battel, received either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he withdrew himself; were all made of the same metal.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermost bounds of his Kingdom, until by Teribazus, one of his Captains, he was perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Provinces to the enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharp disputation of Title to a Kingdom is most available) would have grown superiour in reputation. By such advice, the King resolved upon meeting with his Brother, who now began to be secure, being fully perswaded, that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the field. For the King having cast up a Trench of almost forty miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteen foot deep, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be far distant from his enemies.

§. IV.

The Battel between Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THE Army of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evil waies, and scarcity ſcarcity of victuals, was much incouraged by perceiving this great fear of Artaxerxes; and being paſt this Trench, marched careleſly in great diſorder, having beſtowed their Arms in Carts; and upon Beaſts of carriage; when on the ſudden one of their Van-currors, brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themſelves, and had ranged their Battels in good order upon the ſide of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their enemies, whom they ſaw not till it was afternoon. But when they ſaw the cloud of duſt raiſed by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their near approach how well they were marſhalled, coming on very orderly in ſilence, whereas it had been expected, that ruſhing violently with loud clamors, they ſhould have ſpent all their force upon the firſt brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were ſo unequal in diſtent, being all embattelled in one body and ſquare, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Perſian manner) in the midſt of his own, did not with the corner, and utmoſt point thereof, reach to the half breadth of Artaxerxes his battel, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks begin to diſtruſt their own manhood, which was not accuſtomed to make proof of it ſelf, upon ſuch exceſſive odds. It was almoſt incredible, that ſo great an Army ſhould be ſo eaſily chaſed. Neverthelеſs, it quickly appeared, that theſe Perſians, having learned (contrary to their cuſtom) to give charge upon their enemies with ſilence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receive a ſtrong charge with courage. Upon the very firſt offer of an on-ſet, made by the Greeks, all that beaſtly rabble of cowards fled amain, without abiding the ſtroke, or ſtaying till they were within reach of a dart. The Chariots armed with hooks and ſithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did ſmall hurt that day, becauſe the drivers of them leaping down, fled away on foot. This baſe demeanour of his enemies gave ſo much confidence to Cyrus and his Followers, that ſuch as were about him forthwith adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had been aſſured unto him that day, had not he ſought how to declare himſelf worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompaſs the Greeks, and to ſet upon them in the rear, he advanced with ſix hundred Horſe, and gave ſo valiant a charge upon a ſquadron of ſix thouſand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, ſlaying the Captain thereof Artagerſes, with his own hands, and putting all the reſt to flight. Hereupon his whole company of ſix hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chaſe, leaving Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King ſtood in troop, uncertain whether to fight, or leave the field, could not contain himſelf, but ſaid, I ſee the man: and preſently, with a ſmall handful of men about him, ran upon his Brother, whom he ſtrake through the Curace, and wounded in the breaſt. Having given this ſtroke, which was his laſt, he received immediately the fatal blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a Dart, thrown by a baſe fellow, wherewith aſtonied, he fell dead from his horſe, or ſo hurt, that it was unpoſſible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their beſt for his ſafety; not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Maſter was ſlain. Artaxerxes cauſed the head and right hand of his Brother to be forthwith ſtricken off, and ſhewed to his people, who now purſuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrus, and deſiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troops, and utterly diſmaid ſuch Perſian Captains, as were now, even in their own eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Camp of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes making all ſpeed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tiſſaphernes, who having made way through the Battel of the Greeks, was ready now to joyn with his Maſter in ſpoiling their Tents. Had not the news, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his Brothers death, been ſufficient to countervail all diſaſters received, the exploit of Tiſſaphernes in breaking through the Greeks, would have yielded little comfort. For Tiſſaphernes had not ſlain any one man of the Greeks, but contrariwiſe, when he came upon them, they opening their Battel, drave him with great ſlaughter through them, in ſuch wiſe, that he rather eſcaped as out of an hard paſſage, than forced his way through the ſquadron of the Greeks. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Maſters of the field, gave chaſe to all that came in their ſight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greeks, intending to set upon them in the rear. But these good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seek honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued unto a certain Village, that lay under a hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seem to have slain with his own hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough, shewing a manly look half a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaid on the top of a Spear. This ensign might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greeks espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so near them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the spur: so that none remained in the place of battel, save only the Greeks, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harm, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no news of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to return to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings coming had given them no leisure to dine.

§. V.

The hard estate of the Greeks after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vain sought to have made them yield unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sun, and they bringing home dark night with them, found their Camp spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serve for food: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleep. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baseness of his people, and weakness of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greeks: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful demeanor of his Army, should live to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved to try all means, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seen: to which purpose he sent them a brave message the next morning; charging them to deliver up their Arms, and come to his Gates, to await there upon his Mercy. It seems that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, upon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greeks being advertised that morning from Arieus, a principal Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himself to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from thence, whence intending to return into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would joyn with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Arieus, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arieus himself in the Kings Throne, if he would joyn with them, and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Camp, whose errand seemed to the Captains very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yield their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yielded to such a motion: a third asked, whether the King, as having the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in a way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindness. To this question Phalinus a Grecian, waiting upon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the middest whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats; for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalinus, that having nothing left, but their Arms and Valour, whilest they kept their Arms, their Valour would be serviceable; but should they yield them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remain their own. Hereat Phalinus laughed, saying;

This

This young man did seem a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deep speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Arms and Valour to prevail against the great King. It seems that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imployed in a business of importance, thought himself too profound a States-man, to be checkt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himself was (of whom no more is known, than that he brought an unhoneſt message to his own Country-men, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the mercileſs Barbarians) this young Scholar by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principal Commanders were surprised by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seen the wars before, undertook the conduct of the Army, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithful to the King, as they had been to Cyrus, offering their service in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have use of them. But the final answer was, That without Weapons they could neither do the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing War if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the General told him, They liked it. How (saith Phalinus) must I understand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise war, said Clearchus. But whether war or peace, quoth this politique Embassadour? To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greeks were fain to feed upon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rosted with Arrows, Darts, and wooden Targets, thrown away by the Enemies.

How the Greeks began to return homewards.

AT night they took their way towards Ariæus, to whom they came at midnight; being forsaken by four hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled over to the King; by whom how they were entertained, I do not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces, for had they been kindly used, it may well be thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, and served as Stales to draw in the rest. Ariæus being of too base a temper, and birth, to think upon seeking the Kingdom for himself, with such assistance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make covenant with them for mutual assistance unto the last: Whereunto both parts having sworn, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieve them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearisome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seem by declining them, to shew fear, or weakness. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behaviour; Nor strange, that the Græcians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an unknown Countrey, should be very fearful: but it is almost past belief, that the noise which was heard of these poor men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to do, should make the Persians fly out of their Camp, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Arms, he should crave peace of them. The next day very early came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadors, to entreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars do best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run over the general passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battel, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to hear of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieve them.

How Tissaphernes, under colour of peace, betrayed all the Captains of the Greeks.

HItherto the Greeks, relying upon their own virtue, had rather advanced their affairs, than brought themselves into any straights or terms of disadvantage. But now came unto them the subtil Fox Tissaphernes, who circumventing the Chief Commanders by fine sleights, did mischievously entrap them, to the extreme danger of the Army. He told them, that his Province, lying near unto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliverance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrymen at home, would not be unthankful for such a benefit. Herewithall he forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battel shewed his face to the Greeks, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Camp, and gave chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you safe into Greece; in which sute I have good hope to speed, if you will send a mild answer to him, who hath willed me to ask you, for what cause ye have born Arms against me. The Captains hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly, as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should pass freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they took, and committing no spoil: yet that it should be lawful for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties having sworn, the League was concluded; and Tissaphernes, returning to the King to take leave, and end all business came unto them again after twenty dayes, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty days, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breed doubt, the Brethren, the Kindred of Arieus, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did work him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greeks than formerly he had been. This caused many to advise Clearchus, rather to pass forward as well as he might, than to rely upon covenants, and sit still whilst the King layed snares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilst they were well, and not to cast themselves again into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treaty; reciting withall their own wants, and the Kings means, but especially the Oathes mutually given and taken, wherewith he saw no reason why the enemy should have clogged himself if he meant mischief, having power enough to do them harm by a fair and open War.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatness and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or base respect, was like to have drawn it from him. But his falshood was such, both in substance and in success, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountain of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyar. A lye may find excuse when it grows out of fear: for that passion hath his original from weakness. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the Divine Justice, doth commit that sin with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captains, whom he subtilly got into his power by a train; making the General Clearchus himself the mean to draw in all the rest. The business was contrived thus: Having travelled some days together in such wise, that the Persians did not encamp with the Greeks, who were very jealous of the great familiarity appearing between Tissaphernes and Arieus; Clearchus thought it convenient to root out of Tissaphernes his brains all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, he rehearsed the Oath of Confederacy, which had past between them, shewing how religiously he would keep it; and, repeating the benefits, which the Greeks did receive by the help of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appear to him not unfruitful, if he would make use of their service against the Mysians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Provinces; or against the the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the Great King. For which cause he desired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not give place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithless Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred fair occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to mind how many waies he could have used to bring them to confusion, without peril to himself; especially by burning the Country, through which they were to pass, whereby they must needs have perished by meer famine. For which cause he said, that it had been great folly, to seek by perjury, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his own love to them had moved him to work their safety, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himself, and the King, by their assistance; but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtain what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captains with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention between them. Clearchus himself being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chief Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders to repair with him to the Camp of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had been to some common Fair. But being there arrived, Clearchus, with other the five principal Collonels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a sign was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slain. Forthwith certain bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greeks as they met, and riding up to the very Camp of the Græcians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had been done. Hereupon the Greeks took Arms in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith have assailed their Camp. Anon they might perceive the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own Brother, And Ariæus, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principal men in the Army, saying, That they brought a message from the King, which Ariæus delivered to this effect: That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the league made, was justly rewarded with death; that Mnemon and Proxenus, two other of the five Collonels, for detecting his treachery, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their arms, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his servant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed upon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send back Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greeks might be advised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus and the other four were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandment their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amiss to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousness of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greeks, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aid of men and mony, he did so ill manage his affairs, that neither subtilty, nor perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) availed him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who took it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treachery, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not do, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to fly from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let us return to the prosperity, wherein he triumphed without great cause, having betrayed braver men than himself, and intending to bring the like mischief upon the whole Army.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartned the Greeks, and in despight of Tissaphernes went off safely.

GReat was the heavineſs of the souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders, and no less their fear of the evil hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how how to avoid. Among the reſt, Xenophon, whoſe learning ſupplied his want of experience, finding the deep ſadneſs of the whole Army, to be ſuch as hindred them from taking any courſe of preventing the danger at hand, began to adviſe the under-officers of Proxenus his Companies, whoſe familar friend he had been, to bethink themſelves of ſome mean, whereby their ſafety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: ſetting before their eyes whatſoever might ſerve for to give them hope, and above all, perſwading them in no wiſe to yield to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they deſired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and ſo together with him, the ſame night calling up ſuch as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fitteſt men to ſucceed in the places of thoſe who were ſlain, or taken. This being done, and order ſet down for disburdening the Army of all ſuperfluous impediments, they eaſily comforted themſelves for the loſs of Tiſſaphernes his aſſiſtance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than he had been wont to ſell them; To which purpoſe they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among ſome plentiful Villages, and ſo to proceed, marching towards the heads of thoſe great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to paſs them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tiſſapherners, whom they, ſerving all on foot, were not able to requite for the harm which they received by the Perſian Archers, who ſhot at a farther diſtance than the Greeks could reach. For this cauſe did Xenophon provide ſlings, wherewith he overreached the enemy; and finding ſome horſes fit for ſervice, that were employed among the carriages, he ſet men upon them; training likewiſe his Archers to ſhoot compaſs, who had been accuſtomed to the point-blank. By theſe means did he bear off the Perſians, who aſſailed him; and ſometimes gave them chaſe with that band of fifty Horſe, which being well backt with a firm body of footmen, and ſeconded with troops of the light-armed ſhot and ſlingers, compelled the enemy to lye aloof. Tiſſaphornes not daring to come to handy gripes with theſe reſolute men, did poſſeſs the tops of mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to paſs. But finally, when their valour made way through all ſuch difficulties, he betook himſelf to that courſe, which was indeed the ſureſt, of burning the Country. With great ſorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some adviſed to defend the Country, as granted by the enemy himſelf to be theirs; others to make more fires, if ſo perhaps the Perſians might be aſhamed to do that which was the deſire of ſuch as made paſſage in hoſtile manner; But theſe were faint comforts. The beſt counſel was, that being near unto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Perſian, they ſhould enter into their Country, paſſing over ſome high mountains which lay between them. This courſe they followed, which could not have availed them, if Tiſſaphernes had begun ſooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to ſeek to force, or circumvent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greek Army found in paſſing thorow the Land of the Carduchi.

ENtring upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accuſtomed by force to defend themſelves againſt the huge Armies of the Perſian, were no way inferiour to the Greeks in daring, but only in the Art of War. They were very light of foot, skilful Archers, and uſed the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Country were of much uſe againſt theſe poor travellers, afflicting them in ſeven daies which they ſpent in that paſſage, far more than all the power of the Great King had done. Between the Territory of theſe Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ran Centrites, a great River, upon which the Greeks refreſhed themſelves one day, rejoycing that they had ſo well eſcaped theſe dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove eaſie. But the next morning they ſaw certain troops of Horſe, that lay to forbid their paſſage. Theſe were levied by the Kings Deputies in thoſe parts; Tiſſaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deep, ſo that it was not poſſible for ſuch as would enter it, to make reſiſtance againſt thoſe which kept the oppoſite banks. To increaſe theſe dangers, the Carduchi, following upon them, lay on the ſide of a Mountain, within leſs than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to diſcover a Foord, by which the greater number of them paſſing over, did eaſily chaſe away the Subjects of the Perſian, and then ſending back the moſt expedite men, gave ſuccour to the Rear-ward, againſt which the Carduchi duchi being ſlightly armed, could not on plain ground make reſiſtance hand to hand. Theſe Carduchi ſeem to have inhabited the Mountains of Niphates, which are not far from the Spring of Tygris, though Ptolemy place them far more to the Eaſt upon the River of Cyrus in Media; wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whoſe relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth beſt in this caſe deſerve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Towns, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may indure the ſeverity of a Critick. For Ptolemy, and the whole Nation of Geographers, add ſmall light to this Expedition: only of this laſt, I think it the ſame which falleth into Tygris, not much above Artaſigarta, ſpringing out of Niphates, and running by the Town of Sardeva in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greeks having paſſed Centrites did arrive.

How Teribaſus Governour of Armenia, ſeeking to entrap the Greeks with terms of feigned peace, was diſappointed, and ſhamefully beaten.

THe Army finding in Armenia good proviſion, marched without any diſturbance about fifty or threeſcore miles to the heads of the River Tygris, and paſſing over them, travelled as far further without reſiſtance, till they were encountred by Teribazus, at the River Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though ſmall, but Ptolemy and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Country for the Perſian, and was in great favour with Artaxerxes, whoſe Court may ſeem to have been a School, where the Art of falſhood was taught as wiſdom. He deſired peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, That they ſhould take what they pleaſed, but not burn down the Towns and Villages in their way. As ſoon as he had made this league, he levied an Army, & beſetting the ſtreights of certain Mountains which they were to paſs, hoped well to make ſuch benefit of their ſecurity, as might give him the commendation of being no leſs craftily diſhoneſt than Tiſſaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of ſucceſs. For a great Snow fell, which cauſed the Greeks to make many fires, and ſcatter themſelves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus alſo made many fires, and ſome of his men wandred about ſeeking relief. By the fires he was diſcovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken priſoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greeks, taking this captive with them for a guide, ſought him out; and coming upon his Camp, did ſo affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the ſhout which was raiſed by the Van-currors, chaſed him away. They took his Pavillion, wherein (beſides many ſlaves, that were Artificers of voluptuouſneſs) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went Northward, and paſſing Euphrates, not far below the ſprings thereof, travelled with much difficulty through deep Snow, being followed aloof by the enemy, who durſt not approach them, but did cut off ſuch as they found ſtragling behind. The Inhabitants of the Country, thorow which they marched, had their wintering houſes under ground, wherein was found great plenty of Victuals, and of Cattel, which likewiſe did winter in the ſame Cellars with the owners. Having refreſhed themſelves in thoſe parts, and taken ſufficient eaſe after the miſerable journey, which had conſumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-ſlaves, and taking away (beſides other Horſes and Cattel) ſome Colts that were bred up for the Great King.

§. XI.

The paſſage of the Army to Trabyzond, thorow the Countries bordering upon the River of Phaſis, and other obſcure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phaſis, near whereunto the people called Phaſiani, Tacchi, and Chalybes were ſeated. Theſe Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountains, which the Greeks were to paſs, made countenance of war: but ſome Companies being ſent by night to ſeize upon a place of equal height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, ſecured the aſcent of the reſt; which cauſed theſe people to flye, every one retiring to the defence of his own. The firſt upon whoſe Country the Greeks did enter, were the Tacchi, who conveying all their proviſion of victuals into ſtrong holds, brought the Army into much want, until with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great ſtore of Cattel were taken; the people, to avoid captivity, threw themſelves head-long down the rocks, the very women throwing down down first their own children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great booty of Cattel, which served to feed them, travelling through the Land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greeks hand to hand, killing as many as they took prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great grief of their companions living; who were glad, when after seven dayes journey they escaped from those continual skirmishes, wherewith they had been vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travelling through a good corn-Country, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Town, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoyning, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountain, whence they might discover the Euxine Sea. From Gymnius (which was the name of his Town) he led them through the Territory of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountain called Teches, being (as I think) a part of the Mountains called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course: and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who born in that place had been sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Cholchos, wherein stands the City of * Trabisond, called then Trapezus, a Colony of the Greeks. The Colchi entertaining them with hostility, were requited with the like; for the Army having now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoil the Country thirty dayes together, forbearing only the Borderers upon Trabizond, at the Citizens request.

* Trabisond, a Colony of the Greeks, situate in the bottom of the Euxine Sea.

§. XII.

How the Army began at Trabizond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to return home by Sea: how they came into the Territory of Synope, and there prosecuted the same purpose.

HAving now found an Haven-Town, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, and change their tedious Land-journies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedæmonian, one of the principal Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibus the Lacedæmonian Admiral, who was his friend, that he would provide Vessels to embark them. Having thus concluded, they likewise took order for the staying of such ships as should pass that way, meaning to use them for their Navigation. Lest all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoyning to clear the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were utterly unwilling to give ear, being desirous to return by Sea: but the Country, fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizond: the other took Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were stayed to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals began to fail, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, near unto the Camp, was already quite wasted, they were fain to embark their sick men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Army took their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greek Town, where the Fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand and six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Country of the [a] Mosynaci, who were divided into factions. The stronger party despising their friendship, caused them to joyn them with the weaker whom they left Masters of all.

[a] Mosynaci a Nation of Pontus Cappadocius.

The next place of their abode was [b] Cotyora, a Greek Town likewise, and a Colony of the Synopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Town by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sick in convenient lodgings taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Town. These news were unwelcome to [c] Synope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, lings, and threatning to joyn with the Paphlagonians, if redreſs could not otherwiſe be had, were roundly anſwered by Xenophon, That meer neceſſity had enforced the Army to teach thoſe of Cotyora good manners in ſo bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it ſelf; to which, if cauſe were given, they would lend aſſiſtance. Upon this anſwer the Embaſſadours grew better adviſed, promiſing all friendſhip that the State of Sinope could ſhew, and commanding the Town of Cotyora to relieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promiſed to aſſiſt them with ſhipping, letting them underſtand how difficult the paſſage by Land would prove, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which croſſed their way. This good counſel, and the fair promiſes accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would ſpare for no coſt, to be freed from ſuch a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would paſs the reſt of the way by Sea; provided, that if there ſhould want ſuch number of Veſſels as might ſerve to imbark every one of them; then would they not put from the ſhore.

[b] Cotyora a Port-Town in the same Region.

§. XIII.

Of diſſention which aroſe in the Army, and how it was embarked.

HItherto the danger of Enemies, and miſeries of weather and wants, had kept the company in firm unity; which now began to diſſolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring air of Greece, warming their heads with private reſpects to their ſeveral ends and purpoſes. Whilſt they, who were ſent as Agents from the Camp, remained at Sinope; Xenophon conſidering the ſtrength and valour of his men, and the opportunity of the coaſt whereon they lay, thought it would be an honorable work to build a City in thoſe parts, which were ſoon like to prove great and wealthy, in regard both of their own puiſſance, and of the great repair of the Greeks into that quarter. For this cauſe he made ſacrifice, according to the ſuperſtition of his time and Country, divining of his ſucceſs by the entrails of beaſts. The Sooth-ſayer whom he imployed, had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battel in ten days: he therefore, having preſerved his money carefully, was deſirous to be ſoon at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpoſe of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diverſity of mens opinions; ſome approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this conſultation, were ſore afraid, leſt the poverty of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themſelves at home, ſhould give ſucceſs to the project. Which to prevent, they promiſed to ſupply the Army with a ſufficient Fleet, and likewiſe offered mony to ſome of the Captains, who thereupon undertook to give the Souldiers pay, if they would preſently ſet ſail for Greece. One of theſe Captains being a baniſhed man, deſired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to lead them into Cherroneſus. Xenophon, who deſired only the common good, was pleaſed greatly with theſe propoſitions, and profeſſed openly that he would have them to ſet forward, and hold together in any caſe, puniſhing him as a Traytor that ſhould forſake the Army, before ſuch time as they were arrived at their journeys end. Silanus the Sooth-ſayer, who had uttered Xenophons purpoſe, was hereby ſtayed from out-running his fellows, and driven to abide with his wealth among poor men, longer than ſtood with his good liking. Alſo the other Captains were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that ſhips were prepared ſufficient for their Navigation, but that the mony promiſed to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope and Heraclea, knowing that the Army was now reſolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon whom they feared, had perſwaded them to this reſolution, thought it the wiſeſt way to furniſh them with a Navy, whilſt they were in good readineſs, to depart, but to keep the mony to themſelves. The Captains therefore, who being diſappointed by theſe Towns, found themſelves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with fair hopes, repented much of their fair offers, and ſignifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make propoſition to the Army, of taking the ſhips, and ſailing to Phaſis, where they might ſeize upon Lands, and plant themſelves in ſuch wiſe as ſhould ſtand beſt with their good liking. But finding him cold in the buſineſs, they began to work the principal of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the reſt. Theſe news becoming publick, bred a ſuſpition of Xenophon, as if he had won the reſt of the Captains to his purpoſe, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gave them satisfaction, and withal complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redress. A general inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents, desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have been sought, for that the Greeks, having now their fleet in a readiness, did soon weigh Anchors, and set sail for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promised to give the Army pay as soon as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIV.

Another great dissention and distraction of the Army. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THe nearer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not return home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Army were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose favour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedæmonians, who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who forsook the Army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the intrails that threatned ill success to his Government, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laid upon Cherisophus a Lacedæmonian. It seems that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yielding to such tokens as forbad him to accept it: especially, knowing so well their desire, which was, by right or by wrong, to get wealth wheresoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or foe. Cherisophus had been General but six or seven days, when he was deposed; for having been unwilling to rob the Town of Heraclea, which had sent presents to the Camp, and been very beneficial unto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two daies they had sailed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their journy by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in mind of seeking to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that all their provision would be spent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Country, victuals and other necessaries could not be had without money; for which cause he gave advice to send messengers into the Town of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to understand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of mony, called Cyzicens, which sum amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicens at least; which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being General, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon, but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishoneſt. Lest therefore either of these should fail in managing the business which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and less discretion were sent; who in such wise delivered their insolent message, that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Town, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians and Achæans, they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, chusing new Leaders out of their own number. Above four thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten captains, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the midway between Heraclea and Byzantium, with purpose to assail the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty horse; which small band had done good service already, and could not have been spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governor of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies

Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cauſe he took his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon ſuch ſhipping as he had; who paſſing ſome part of the way by Sea, landed upon the confines of Heraclea, and Thraſia Aſiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpoſe to take ſpoils in Bythinia, divided themſelves into ten Companies, every Captain leading his own Regiment into ſome Village, five or ſix miles from the Sea; in the greater Towns were two Regiments quartered: and ſo was that part of the Country ſurpriſed on the ſudden, and ſacked all at one time. The place of Rendezvouz was an high piece of Ground, where ſome of them arrived, finding no diſturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger: two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men eſcaped, the reſt were all put to the ſword. For the Thracians which had ſlipt at firſt out of the Souldiers hands, did raiſe the Country; and finding the Greeks loaden with booty, took the advantage of their diſorder, cutting in pieces thoſe two Regiments: which done, they attempted the reſt, encompaſſing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleaſure make retrait from theſe Arcadians and Achæans, who wanting the aſſiſtance of horſe, and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to ſtand meerly upon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to crave parly. Whatſoever the Articles of compoſition were, the Thracians yielded to all; but pledges for aſſurance they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promiſes of ſuch people, eſpecially ſo incenſed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of ſome Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, paſſing along thoſe parts: and receiving by them true information of the deſperate caſe into which theſe Gallants had fooliſhly thrown themſelves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides, them who gave him the intelligence. His horſemen he ſent before to diſcover, and to ſcour the ways; the light armed footmen took the hill tops on either hand, all of them ſetting fire on whatſoever they found combuſtible: whereby the whole Country ſeemed to be on a light flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that ſome huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five miles of the Arcadians, encreaſing ſtill the number of his fires, which he cauſed haſtily to be quenched ſoon after ſupper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the dark, which cauſed them in all haſte to diſlodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon coming thither in very good order, to have given battel, found that his device, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Grecks were alſo departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, and perceived by ſigns that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which journey he overtook them. They embraced him and his, with great joy: confeſſing that they themſelves had thought the ſame which the enemies did, looking that he ſhould have come by night; wherein finding themſelves deceived, they were afraid leſt he had forſaken them, and therefore haſtened away to overtake him, and joyn with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calphas, where it was decreed, That whoſoever from thenceforth made any motion to diſ-joyn the Army, ſhould ſuffer death.

§. XV.

Of divers pieces of ſervice done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occaſions of the War between the Lacedæmonians and the Perſians.

THE Haven of Calphas lay under a goodly Head-land, that was very ſtrong, and abounding with all kind of Grain and Fruits, except Olives. There was alſo Timber for building and ſhipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities that might have allured the Souldiers to ſtay there, and to plant, cauſed them to haſte away, fearing leſt Xenophon ſhould find ſome device to have ſettled himſelf and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good means to live at home; neither did they ſo much for hope of gain follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare unto him: the poorer ſort were ſuch as left their Parents, Wives and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchaſe) they were now deſirous to return. But whether it were ſo that Xenophon found advantage by their own ſuperſtition, to make them ſtay, which they greatly ſuſpected; or whether the ſigns appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure; ſo long they were inforced to abide in the place till victuals failed: neither would the Captains lead them forth to forrage the Country, until the Sacrifices ſhould promiſe good ſucceſs. Cheriſophus was dead of an Ague, and his ſhips were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the reſt of the Army, which the greater it was, the more proviſion it needed, & the ſooner felt want. For which cauſe, he that was choſen Colonel into the place of Cheriſophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the ſpoil of ſome Villages that ſtood near at hand; in which enterprize he found ill ſucceſs, the whole Country lying in wait to intrap him, and an Army of Horſe being ſet by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the aſſiſtance of theſe Bythinian Thracians, which troops falling upon the Greeks that were ſcattered abroad in ſeeking booty, ſlew five hundred of them, and chaſed the reſt to a certain Mountain thereby. The news of this overthrow coming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army, to the reſcue of thoſe that ſurvived, and brought them ſafe to the Camp; upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du guarde, ſlew ſome, purſuing the reſt to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the preſent condition of the Army, ſo diſheartned and unfurniſhed of neceſſaries, cauſed the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more ſtrength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of ſuch as were leaſt able to endure travel. Xenophon with the firmeſt and beſt able men went forth, both to bury thoſe which were lately ſlain, and to abate the pride of the Thraſians, and their aſſiſtants. In this journey his demeanor was very honourable. For having given burial to the dead, the enemy was diſcovered, lying on the tops of the hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithſtanding that the way was very rough & troubleſome, ſo that ſome thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a wood ſcarce paſſable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with half the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not fail with the greater reſolution to purſue them; from whom if they could ſafely retire to the camp, yet what ſhould they do there, wanting victuals to ſuſtain them in the place, and ſhips to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than another day faſting; and not to regard the uneaſie return, which might ſerve to ſtay Cowards from running away, but to wiſh unto the Enemy a fair and eaſie way, by which he might fly from them. Theſe perſwaſions were followed with ſo valiant execution, that both Perſians and Bythinians being chaſed out of the field, abandoned the Country forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not ſuddenly be conveighed away, to the diſcretion of the Greeks, who had good leiſure gathered the Harveſt of theſe bad Neighbours fields. This was the laſt fight which they had on the ſide of Aſia. For they were not only ſuffered quietly to enjoy the ſpoil of the Country, but when the opinion grew common in thoſe parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embaſſadours were ſent from the Neigbour people, to deſire friendſhip, and make offer of their beſt aſſiſtance. But the Souldiers had no mind to ſtay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they took a great booty, which they carried away unto Chryſopolis, a City near unto Chalcedon, where they ſold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly fear, leſt their long ſtay in that Country might breed in them a deſire to viſit his Province, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he ſent to the Lacedæmonian Admiral, intreating him with much inſtance and large promiſes to waft them over into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admiral condeſcending, promiſed to give the Souldiers pay, as ſoon as they arrived at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Aſia at the intreaty of the Perſian, who in the height of his pride had thought them ſo ſurely impriſoned with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to ſurrender their Arms into his hands, and ſo to yield their lives to his diſcretion. How diſcourteouſly they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how, to requite his injurious dealings, they ſeized upon Byzantium, which by Xenophons perſwaſion they forbare to ſack; I hold it ſuperfluous to relate. For the reſidue of their doings appertain little to the general courſe of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, ſo did it both diſcover the ſecrets of Aſia, and ſtir up the Greeks to think upon greater enterprizes, than ever their forefathers had undertaken. Likewiſe

it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman Wars did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Towns of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seeds of the War shortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already sown, before these Companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Towns of Ionia, which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the Great King, prepared to rebel; which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedæmonians to send them aid, whereby to recover their liberty; and obtained their request. For a power was sent over, under conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities, and their Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Affairs of Greece, whilst they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of Xenophons Army, to make War upon Artaxerxes.

IT seems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes took their favour shewed unto his Brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open War against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no advantage might slip, which could serve to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian work beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Army had revealed the baseness of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many Victories which they themselves had gotten, upon terms of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking upon this huge unweildy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handful had opened the passage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journey of four and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about four thousand two hundred fourscore and one, a very painful march of one year and three months. Nevertheless, the civil distraction, wherewith Greece was miserably torn, and especially that hot fire of the Theban War, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth suddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their own Estate; leaving it questionable, whether Agesilaus having both the same, and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two years, which he spent in Asia, his deeds procured more commendation of magnanimity and fair behaviour, than of stout courage, and great or profitable atchievements. For, how highly soever it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other Wars, to extol his virtue; his exploits being onely a few incursions into the Countries lying near the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons own journey, which I know not whether any Age hath parallel'd: the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with six thousand men from Aqualeia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equal. But of Agesilaus and his Wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speak more in due place.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the War in Asia.

THimbro receiving Xenophons men, began to take in Towns, and to entertain all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had been highly beholding to the King;

King; who seem to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live under the Government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate, as the King his Master did love him. The managing of the War begun by Thimro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands; and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaved himself as a good man of War, and a wise Commander. For whereas the Rule of the low-Countries of Asia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the Worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chief command in those Wars against the Greeks; Dercyllidas, who did bear a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Corrival throughly beaten, though to the Kings loss) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province in few daies, he brought into his own power.

That Country of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gave easie success to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had been Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his Wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaved her self so well, that she not only was beloved of the people under her Government, but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certain Towns adjoyning; and sundry times gave assistance to Pharnabazus in his Wars against the Mysians and Persians. For she had in pay some Companies of Greeks, whose valour by her good usage, did her great service. But somewhat before the arrival of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Son in law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loved much, being blinded with ambition, found means to stifle her, and kill her Son of seventeen years old; which done, he seized upon two of her principal Towns, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have been admitted into possession of her whole Estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with Presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Governour in the place of Mania. His Presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foul treason threatned, whereby the wicked villain was driven into terms of almost utter desperation. In the mean time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Towns of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their gates. One only Town stood out four daies (against the will of the Citizens, who were covetous of liberty) the Governor striving in vain to have kept it to the use of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepsis, which the Traytor held; who fearing all men, as being loved of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speak with him, and pledges for his security: upon the delivery of which, he issued out of Scepsis, and coming into the Camp, made offer to joyn with the Greeks upon such conditions as might seem reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently upon these words they marched toward Scepsis. When Midias perceived that it was in vain to strive against the Army, and the Townsmen, who were all of one mind; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few hours in the City, did a sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forsake his company, but followed him, earnestly entreating that he might be suffered to retain Gergethe: but coming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise do a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traytor, not daring to make denial, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensigns. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized upon, as belonging to one that had been subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greeks: and so the murderous Wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might find any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas having in eight daies taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he took Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of War. That Winter, and the Summer ensuing, the Truce being continued, held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being four or five miles in breadth; by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wilde Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Camp. Likewise the City of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllidas had had command from Sparta to divert the War into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not uneasie to recover all the Towns of Ionia; Pharax the Admiral of the fleet (which was a yearly office) being appointed to joyn with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity; yet was he not in his own danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus, having respect to the Kings service, came to assist his private enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength, which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to find the Towns ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keep the War from their own doors, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoil and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Mæander; and not looking to have been so soon encountred, marched carelesly through the Country: when on the very sudden the whole Army of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greeks, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battel. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readiness, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persians had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeks very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plain. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Ilanders and others, of such places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians, regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight, which must needs have brought them to destruction, if the counsel of Pharnabazus had been followed; who perceiving the opportunity of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider, what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greeks were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to crave parley; the conclusion of which was, That a Truce should be made, to last until Tissaphernes might receive answer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were, on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own liberty and Laws; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gain time unto Tissaphernes, who desired to avoid the War by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by tryal of a battel.

§. III.

How the Lacedæmonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasures. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the mean season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to accompt for some disgraces received by them during the late Wars, when leisure was wanting to the requital of such petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympian Games, had set a fine upon the City of Sparta; for Non-payment of which, they forbad them to come to the solemnity; and publickly whipt one of them that was of note, for presuming to contend against their Decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta from doing sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no business that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usual pretence, which they made the ground of all their Wars: though little they cared for the liberty of such Towns, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meer Vassals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Wars with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to work very slowly: but having now to do with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present success to their desires. Two years together they sent an Army into the Country of the Eleans: the first year an Earthquake (held in those times a prodigious sign, and which did always forbid the prosecution of any enterprize in hand) caused them to retire: the second year, all the Towns of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the City it self was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her own Walls thrown down. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian Games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time coming use modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. in this expedition all the Greeks were assistant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Beotians, whose aid having been of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it self, they could not smother their dislike of their unequal division following the victory; which gave to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth, onely security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equal greatness of two mighty Estates, did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutral Common-weals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affairs required; but when, to revenge injuries, they had by mortal hatred prosecuted the War to extremity, leaving the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily increased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatness which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans, to take occasion of any quarrel, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IV.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His War with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the War diverted into another Province, through perswasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successor. How careless the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Agesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to have the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected upon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to joyn with that of Dercyllidas, he took his way in great pomp to Aulis in Bœotia, a Haven lying opposite to the Iland of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the War against Troy many Ages before) had imbarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon, he meant also to do sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrey, would not permit, but saying, that the performance of such Ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were so unable to conceal their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw down his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himself and his Countrey in a new War; therefore waiting better opportunity of revenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely, and followed his main intendment. Having landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the mean while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, only to win time of making provision for the War, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes, whilst Agesilaus was busie in setling the estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from war was at the coming down of these Forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plain message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forthwith depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that he was glad to hear that his enemies had by perjury deserved vengeance from heaven, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they should provide victuals and other necessaries for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes believe, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horse, in which part of his Forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his Horse into the plains of Mæander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heavy foot-army, not suffering them to pass into that Countrey which was fittest for their service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vain, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they took great spoil without resistance, till such time as the Horsemen of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish having the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that tryal how hard it would be to prevail, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, took all possible care to increase that part of his forces. By which means having enabled enabled himſelf, whilſt Winter laſted, he entred upon the Country of Tiſſaphernes, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horſe-men of Tiſſaphernes in the plain of Mæander, without aſſiſtance of their infantery, he gave them battel, and had a great Victory, taking their Camp, in which he found great riches. The blame of this loſs fell heavy upon Tiſſaphernes, who either upon cowardiſe had abſented himſelf from the battel, or following ſome other buſineſs, was then at Sardis. For which cauſe his Maſter having him in diſtruſt, and thinking that peace might be the ſooner had, which he much deſired, if the man, ſo odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way; he ſent into thoſe parts Tithrauſtes a Perſian, to cut off the head of Tiſſaphernes, and ſucceed him in the Government. Such was the end of this baſe and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purpoſes on Earth, failed at the laſt, through too much over-weening of his own wiſdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himſelf moſt perfect; for ſuppoſing, that by his great skill in ſubtile negotiation he ſhould one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them weary of Aſia; he did not ſeek to finiſh the War, and, according to his Maſters wiſh, bring all things ſpeedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might find ſome opportunity of making ſuch end as might beſt ſtand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it ſeems that he much miſtook his Princes diſpoſition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aid which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found ſuch means whereby the danger it ſelf might have been avoided: as not loving to have War, whilſt by any conditions (honourable, or not) he might obtain peace. And this appeared well by the courſe which Tithrauſtes took at his firſt poſſeſſion of the low-Countries. For he ſent Embaſſadours to Ageſilaus, in very friendly ſort letting him know, that the man who had been Authour of the War, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleaſure to let the Greeks enjoy their own laws and liberty, upon condition, that they ſhould pay him the tribute accuſtomed, and the Army be forthwith diſmiſſed. The anſwer to this propoſition, was by Ageſilaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the mean ſeaſon he was content to transfer the War into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the requeſt of Tithrauſtes, who bought his departure with thirty Talents.

This was a ſtrange manner of War, both on the offenſive, and the defenſive part. For Ageſilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquiſhing the great King, was contented to forbear his ſeveral Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants: and thoſe Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintain his Eſtates againſt all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might eaſily be taken from their ſhoulders) were little offended at any loſs that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were ſubject likewiſe to the ſam. Crown of Perſia, ſo long as their own Government could be preſerved from waſte and danger. The cauſe of this diſorder on the Perſian ſide, I can aſcribe to nothing ſo deſervedly, as to the corrupted eſtate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concubines, and miniſters of pleaſure, were able, by partial conſtruction, to countenance, or diſgrace, the actions of ſuch as had the managing of things abroad; and to that fooliſh manner of the Kings (which was ſo uſual that it might be called a rule) to reward or puniſh the Provincial Governour, according to the benefit or loſs, which the Country, given in charge unto each of them, received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to paſs, that as every one was deſirous to make his own territory yield a large increaſe to the Kings treaſure, ſo no man was carefull to aſſiſt his borderers, if loſs or danger might thereby grow to himſelf and his; but ſate ſtill as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not been uneaſie to recompence the ſpoil of one Country, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miſeries.

§. V.

The War and Treaty between Ageſilaus and Pharnabazus.

Ageſilaus having thus compounded with Tithrauſtes, entred Phrygia, burning and waſting the Country without reſiſtance. He took the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drave him out of the Camp. Theſe Actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their luſtre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of ſtrength, which might have encreaſed his power, and given aſſurance to the reſt of his proceedings: but purchaſed fame and high reputation, by which he drew unto him ſome that were diſcontented and ſtood upon bad terms with the great King; whom he loſt again as eaſily, by means of ſome ſlight injury done to them by his under-Captains. Pharnabazus did not encloſe himſelf in any Town, for fear of being beſieged, but kept the field, lying as neer as he could ſafely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpoſe to fight, but to make ſome good end by compoſition, which he found not uneaſie to do. For the pleaſures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their moſt neceſſity, had been ſo great, that when he (obtaining parley) did ſet before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his love, (which had been ſuch, that beſides many other hazzards of his perſon, he had for the reſcue of their fleet, when it was driven to run a-ſhore at Abydus, adventured to ride into the Seas as far as he could find any ground, and fight on Horſe-back againſt the Athenians) together with his faith which had never been violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuſe their ingratitude, otherwiſe than by telling him, That having War with his Maſter, they were inforced againſt their will, to offend him. Ageſilaus did make a fair offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintain him againſt the Perſian, and eſtabliſh him free Prince of the Countrey wherein he was at that time only Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Maſter did put him in truſt to make war againſt them, he would not fail to do the beſt that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then ſhift ſide, and betake himſelf to their alliance. The iſſue of this parley was, That the Army ſhould no longer abide in Phrygia, nor again return into it, whileſt employment could be found elſewhere. The excuſe made by Ageſilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of thoſe parts, were not ſufficient to appeaſe Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more neceſſary buſineſs elſewhere; but becauſe his Countrey would yield great booty, and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their unthankfulneſs with full revenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raiſed in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Perſian.

IN the mean while Tithrauſtes, perceiving that Ageſilaus meant nothing leſs than to return into Greece, and let Artaxerxes reſt quietly in Aſia, took a wiſe courſe, whereby the City of Sparta was not only driven to look to her own, and give over her great hopes of ſubverting the Empire; but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and ſaw her Dominion reſtrained unto the narrow bounds of her own Territory. He ſent into Greece fifty talents of ſilver, to be imployed in raiſing war againſt the Lacedæmonians; which treaſure was by the ſubtle practice of him that was put in truſt with it, in ſuch wiſe diſperſed among the principal men of the Thebans, Argives, and Corinthians, that all thoſe Eſtates having formerly born ſecret hate to that of Sparta, were now deſirous of nothing ſo much, as of open war. And leſt this great heat of the incenſed multitude ſhould, for want of preſent exerciſe, begin to faint and vaniſh away in idle words, occaſion was found out to thruſt the Lacedæmonians into Arms, that they themſelves might ſeem Authors of the quarrel. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perſwaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning ſo to loſe their Rent, made a diſtreſs by ſtrong hand, recovering a great deal more than their own; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an invaſion made upon Phocis, waſting that Countrey in the manner of open war. Such were the beginnings of profeſſed hoſtility between Thebes & Sparta, & the firſt breaking out of their cloſe enmity, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embaſſadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, & requeſting ſuccour, they had very favourable audience, & ready conſent to their ſuit, it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians to defer the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occaſion of revenge were offer'd, & then to diſcover their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to work their their own wills, having no other war to diſturb them in Greece, and hearing out of Aſia no news that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they ſent Lyſander to raiſe all the Countries about Phocis, and with ſuch forces as he could levy, to attend the coming of Pauſanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath been ſhewed before, had two Kings) who ſhould follow him with the ſtrength of Peloponneſus. Lyſander did as he was appointed, and being of great reputation in thoſe parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Pauſanias likewiſe raiſed all Peloponneſus, except the Corinthians (who refuſed, to aſſiſt him in that enterpriſe) meaning to joyn with Lyſander, and make a ſpeedy end of the war. The conſideration of ſo great a danger, approaching ſo ſwiftly, cauſed the Thebans to ſeek what help they could abroad, foraſmuch as their own ſtrength was far too little to make reſiſtance againſt ſuch mighty preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwiſe affected in heart, than they durſt utter in countenance; but the good wiſhes of ſuch people were little available, conſidering that the moſt which could be expected from them, was, that they ſhould do as little hurt as they could: by which manner of tergiverſation, the Corinthians did at that preſent caſt themſelves into the diſpleaſure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the ſafeſt courſe to procure the aſſiſtance of ſome Eſtate that might preſently declare it ſelf on their ſide, which would cauſe many others to follow the example, and make their party ſtrong. To this end they ſent Embaſſadours to Athens, excuſing old offences, as either not committed by publick allowance, or done in time of the general war, and recompenced with friendſhip lately ſhewn in their refuſal of aſſiſting Pauſanias, when he came in behalf of the thirty Tyrants againſt the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their own Honour ſake, they requeſted them of aid in the preſent war, offering to do the beſt that they could for the reſtoring of Athens to her former eſtate and dignity. Thraſybulus and his Friends, who, perſecuted by the Thirty, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the City to make a large requital of the courteſie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens ſhould not only refuſe to aid the Lacedæmonians in this War; but that it ſhould aſſiſt the Thebans, and engage it ſelf in their cauſe. Whilſt Pauſanias lay ſtill waiting the arrival of his Confederates; Lyſander being deſirous to do ſomewhat that might advance the buſineſs in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Pauſanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Town, and was ſlain in fight by the Thebans, who came haſtily to the reſcue. As this victory did incourage the Thebans, ſo the coming of Pauſanias with his great Army did again amaze them, with preſentation of extreme danger; but their ſpirits were ſoon revived by the ſtrong ſuccour which was brought from Athens, in conſideration of which, and of the late battel, Pauſanias durſt not hazzard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of thoſe that were ſlain, by compoſition, departed out of their Territory; for which, either cowardiſe or indiſcretion, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driven to flie unto Tegea, where he ended his dayes in baniſhment.

How Ageſilaus was called out of Aſia to help his Countrey. A victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian aſſiſted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the maſtery of the Seas, and re-builds the walls of Athens.

THis good ſucceſs, and the confederacy made with Athens, gave ſuch reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith ſide with them, and raiſing a ſtrong Army, determined to give battel to the Lacedæmonians as near as they might, to their own doors; Conſidering that the force of Sparta it ſelf was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magiſtrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, ſent for Ageſilaus, who readily obeyed them, and promiſing his friends in Aſia to return ſpeedily to their aſſiſtance, paſſed the Streights of Helleſpont into Europe. In the mean time, the Cities of the new league had given battel to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Aſſociats; but with ill ſucceſs. For when the right wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chaſe in ſome diſorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battell meeting Ageſilaus at Amphipolis, were by him ſent over into Aſia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had ſince his departure ſeen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lyſander the Admiral ſlain. The ſame man, whoſe endeavour had brought the Athenians into order by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of ſupplies, was now the occaſion that the power of Athens grew ſtrong at Sea, when the City was deſpoyled of her old reputation, and ſcarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus conſidering how much it imported the King his Maſter, to have the Greeks divided into ſuch factions as might utterly diſable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the ſafeſt way for himſelf, during theſe broils, to take ſuch order, that he ſhould not need any more to ſeek peace by intreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked, had ſold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpoſe he furniſhed Conon the Athenian with eight ſhips, who had eſcaped when the Fleet of Athens was ſurprized by Lyſander at Ægos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navy, wherewith he requited the loſs received at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like deſtruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon ſailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, ſo ſtrong a Navy, and ſo much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Walls, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Signiory which they had loſt.

§. VIII.

Of ſundry ſmall victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians loſe all in Aſia; the Athenians recover ſome part of their old Dominion.

NEvertheleſs, the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for ſome years the honour of their Eſtate, endangered very greatly by this loſs at Sea. For Ageſilaus obtained the better with his horſe-men from the Theſſalians, who were accounted the beſt riders in Greece. He waſted Bœtia, and fought a great battel at Coronea againſt the Thebans and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marſhall Gylis forraged the Countrey of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gain of theſe victories was not great, and the reputation of them was, by many loſſes, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battel of Coronea vanquiſh the Orchomenians, who ſtood oppoſite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Ageſilaus charged them in the return from the purſute. Likewiſe Gylis was ſlain with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and ſome other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed againſt the Corinthians, were repayed with equal dammage, received in the parts adjoyning; many Towns being eaſily taken, and as eaſily recovered. The variety of which enterfeats was ſuch, that the Thebans themſelves were drawn by the loſs of the haven of Corinth, to ſue for peace, but could not get audience, till ſuch time as the news came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embaſſadors being ſent for, and willed to do their meſſage, required only in ſcorn, to have a ſafe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incurſions, wherein the Achæans, Confederates of Sparta, felt much loſs, their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians; who held with the contrary ſide, until Ageſilaus repayed theſe invaders with equal, or greater calamities, brought upon their own Lands, which did ſo afflict the Acarnans, that they were driven to ſue for peace. But the affairs at Sea were of moſt conſequence, upon which the ſucceſs of all depended. For when the Towns of Aſia perceived that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in a hard War at home, but almoſt diſabled to paſs the Seas, having loſt their Fleet at Cnidus; they ſoon gave ear to Pharnabazus, who promiſed to allow that they ſhould uſe their own laws, if they would expell the Spartan Governours. Only the City of Abydus did ſtand firm, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his beſt to contain all the Towns about Helleſpont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, becauſe the Athenian Fleet under Thraſibulus, took in Bizantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Iſle of Leſbos to their ancient acknowledgment of Athens.

The baſe conditions offered unto the Perſian by the Lacedæmonian. Of ſundry fights and other paſſages in the War. The Peace of Antalcidas.

ABout this time the Spartans began to perceive how uneaſie a thing it would be, to maintain the War againſt men as good as themſelves, aſſiſted with the treaſures of Perſia: wherefore they craved peace of Artaxerxes, moſt baſely offering not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Aſia, and to leave them to the Kings diſpoſition; but withall, to ſet the Iſlanders, and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and abſolute liberty, whereby they ſaid that all their principal Eſtates of their Country would be ſo weakened, that no one, nor all of them ſhould be able to ſtir againſt the Great King. And ſure it was, that the power of the Country being ſo broken and rent into many ſmall pieces, could neither have diſquieted the Perſian, by an offenſive War, nor have made any good defence againſt him, but would have left it eaſie for him in continuance of time to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himſelf Maſter of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were ſo carried with envy, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they choſe rather to give all from themſelves and others, and make all alike weak, than to permit that any of their own Nation ſhould grow ſtronger than themſelves, who ſo lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the firſt accepted; both in regard that the other Eſtates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalf joyned together againſt the Lacedæmonians, did by their ſeveral Embaſſadors oppoſe themſelves unto it; and for that it was thought ſafeſt for Artaxerxes rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interpoſing himſelf to bring friends and foes on the ſudden to an equality. Eſpecially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had ſent as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did ſeek to repay the harm done by Ageſilaus in thoſe parts: which his intent appearing plain, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Thimbro was ſent into Aſia to make War upon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places: whereby the War being ſcattered about, all the Iſles and Towns on the firm Land, grew almoſt to the manner of Pyracy and Robbery, affording many skirmiſhes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Thimbro was ſlain by Struthas, and in his place Diphridas was ſent, who demeaned himſelf more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, becauſe he had not impeached Thraſybulus in his enterprizes about Helleſpont; Anaxibius, who ſucceeded him, was ſurprized and ſlain in a skirmiſh by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thraſybulus departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was ſlain by the way at Aſpendus. The City of Rhodes had long before joyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Ariſtocratie, or the Government of a few the principal Citizens; whereas contrariwiſe the Athenians were accuſtomed to put the Soveraignty into the hands of the people, each of them ſeeking to aſſure themſelves by erecting in the Town of their Confederates a Government like unto their own: which doing (where more eſpecial cauſe did not hinder) cauſed the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The people of Ægina roved upon the coaſt of Attica which cauſed the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and beſiege their Town: but this ſiege being raiſed by the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, the Iſlanders began a-new to moleſt Attica, which cauſed the Athenians to man their ſhips again, that returned beaten, having loſt four of thirteen. The loſs of theſe ſhips was ſoon recompenced by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian General had in Ægina, whereupon the Iſlanders were fain to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may wel ſeem ſtrange that the City of Athens, having but newly raiſed her walls, having not by any fortunate and important Battel ſecured her eſtate from dangers by Land; but only depending upon the aſſiſtance of ſuch Confederates, as, carried unto different ends, had often diſcovered themſelves irreſolute in the common cauſe, would ſend a Fleet and an Army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the Maſtery of the Seas was ſo ill aſſured, that an Iſland in the eye of Pyræeus, had ability to vex the coaſt of Attica. But as the over-weening of that City did cauſe it uſually to embrace more than it could compaſs; ſo the inſolency and ſhameleſs injuſtice of the people, had now bred in the chief Commanders, a deſire to keep themſelves far out of ſight, and to ſeek employments at ſuch diſtance as might ſecure them from the eyes of the envious, and from publick judgments, out of which few or none eſcaped. For which cauſe Timotheus did paſs away much part of his time in the Iſle of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Country could well have ſpared: with which he returned not when the buſineſs in Cyprus came to an end, but ſought new adventures in Egypt; whereby aroſe neither thanks to himſelf, nor profit to his City, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careleſs of things at hand, had a notable blow given unto them, ſhortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their own Haven. For Teleutias, a Lacedæmonian, being made Governour of Ægina, conceived a ſtrong hope of ſurprizing the Navy of Athens, as it lay in Piræus; thinking aright, that it was a harder matter to encounter with ten ſhips prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whoſe Mariners were aſleep in their Cabbins, or drinking in Taverns. Wherefore he ſailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entring at the break of day, he found (according to his expectation) moſt of the men on ſhore, and few or none left aboard to make reſiſtance: by which means he took many ſhips laden with merchandizes, many fiſher-men, paſſengers, and other Veſſels, alſo three or four Gallies; having ſunk or broken, and made unſerviceable, as many of the reſt as the time would ſuffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in marriage, with whom he lived about the Court; and many Officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians, were placed in the lower Aſia; by whoſe aſſiſtance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Helleſpont; in ſuch wiſe, that perhaps they ſhould not have needed the peace, which they themſelvs procured by Antalcidas, from the Great King, the conditions whereof were ſuch as are mentioned before, giving freedom to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Country into as many ſeveral States as were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxexes having bought his own peace with mony, did likewiſe by his mony become Arbitrator and decider of Controverſies between the Greeks, diſpoſing of their buſineſs in ſuch wiſe, as ſtood beſt with his own good. The Tenor of Artaxerxes his Decree was, That all Aſia and Cyprus ſhould be his own; the Iſles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus, be ſubject to Athens; all other Greek Towns, as well the little as the great, be ſet at liberty; and that whoſoever ſhould refuſe this peace, upon them the approvers of it ſhould make war, the King aſſiſting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ſhips, and treaſure. The Athenians were ſo diſcouraged by their loſſes at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their confederates, and the neceſſity of maintaining many Garriſons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miſeries of the war, whereof they ſaw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did conſent unto theſe Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themſelves the execution, did not only compell the Argives to depart out of Corinth, (which, under pretence of defending, they held by Garriſons, lately thruſt into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Bœotia free, of which Province Thebes had alwayes held the Government, the Thebans themſelves being alſo comprehended under the name of the Bœotians; but cauſed the Mantinæans to throw down their own City, and to dwell in Villages: alledging that they had formerly been accuſtomed ſo to do, though purpoſing indeed to chaſtiſe them, as having been ill-affected to Sparta in the late War. By theſe courſes the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the ſmall Towns in Greece would, when occaſion ſhould require it, willingly follow them in their wars, as Authors of their liberty; and that the great Cities having loſt all their dependants, would be unable to make oppoſition.

Country

§. X.

The War which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treaſon; and Olynthus by Famine.

WHilſt theſe wars, which ended without either victory or profit, conſumed the riches and power of Greece, the City of Olynthus in Thrace was grown ſo mighty, that ſhe did not only command her neighbour-Towns, but was alſo become terrible to places far removed, and to Sparta it ſelf. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principal City of that Kingdom, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the uſual pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to ſet at liberty the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almoſt now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themſelves. The Citizens of Acanthus, and of Apollonia, being neareſt unto the danger of thoſe incroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their fear, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians, would be too ſtrong for all Greece, if continuance of time ſhould give it reputation, which only it wanted: wherefore they requeſted aſſiſtance, but in ſuch terms as did ſound of compulſion, proteſting that either they muſt war upon Olynthus, or become ſubject unto her, and fight in her defence.

Hereupon

Hereupon was made a haſty levy of men, two thouſand being ſent preſently away, with promiſe to be ſeconded by a greater Army. Whilſt theſe two thouſand gave ſuch beginning to the war, as agreed with their ſmall number, the body of the Army following them, ſurprized the Cittadel of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phœbidas the Lacedæmonian, by ſome of the Magiſtrates, who ſought to ſtrengthen their faction by the ſlavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill-affected to Sparta, but had not in any point violated the peace lately made between them; which cauſed the Lacedæmonians to doubt, whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthy of reward or of puniſhment. In concluſion, profit ſo far over-weighed honeſty, that the deed was approved, many principal Citizens of Thebes condemn d to death, many driven into baniſhment, and the Traitors rewarded with the Government of the City: by whoſe authority, and the force of the Garriſon, the Thebans were compelled to ſerve the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This acceſs of power having ſtrengthened the Lacedæmonians, cauſed them to entertain the greater forces about Olynthus, (which notwithſtanding the loſs of one great Battel, and ſome other diſaſters) they compelled at length by famine to render it ſelf unto their obedience.

How the Thebans recovered their liberty, driving out the Lacedæmonian Garriſon.

AFter this Olynthian War, which endured almoſt three years, it ſeemed that no Eſtate in Greece was able to make head againſt that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a means to ſhake off their yoak, and gave both example and means to others to do the like. One of the baniſht men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magiſtrates, coming to Athens, that the tyranny wherewith his Country was oppreſſed, pleaſed him no better than it did thoſe, who for fear of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laid between theſe two, that ſoon found very good ſucceſs, being managed thus. Seven of the baniſhed men forſook Athens privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where ſpending the next day ſecretly, they came late in the evening to the Gates like husband-men returned from work, and ſo paſſed undiſcovered unto the houſe of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawn into the conſpiracy. The day following, a ſolemn feaſt being then held in the City, Phyllidas promiſed the Governours, who were inſolent and luſtful men, that he would convey unto them that night the moſt beautiful Dames of the Town, with whom they ſhould take their pleaſure. Having cheared them with ſuch hope, and plenty of good Wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that he could not make good his promiſe, unleſs they would diſmiſs their followers, becauſe the Gentlewomen, who attended without the Chamber, would not endure that any of the ſervants ſhould ſee their faces. Upon this occaſion the attendants were diſmiſſed, and the Conſpirators, attired like Ladies and their Maids, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours looſe behaviour, ſlew them all upon the ſudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then preſently caſting off their diſguiſe, they went to other places, where feigning themſelves to come to the Governours upon buſineſs, they got admittance, and likewiſe ſlew thoſe which were of the Lacædemonian faction. By the like device they brake into the Priſon, ſlew the Gaoler, and ſet at liberty ſuch as they thought meet; and being followed by theſe deſperate men, proclaimed liberty, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captain of the Caſtle hearing the ſueden Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be ſtronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwiſe miſtruſted, that it was a practice to diſcover ſuch as would be forward upon occaſion of revolting. But as ſoon as daylight revealed the plain truth, all the people took Arms and beſieged the Caſtle, ſending haſtily to Athens for ſuccour. The Garriſon alſo ſent for aid unto the Towns adjoyning, whence a few broken troops coming to the reſcue, were defeated on the way by the horſe-men of Thebes. On the other ſide, the baniſhed Thebans did not only make ſpeed to aſſiſt their Country-men, but procured ſome Athenians to joyn with them, & thereby came ſo ſtrong into the City, that the Caſtle was yielded, more through fear than any neceſſity, upon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Arms; for which compoſition, the Captain at his return to Sparta was put to death. When the news of the doings at Thebes, and the ſucceſs arrived at Sparta, an Army was raiſed forthwith, and all things prepared as earneſtly for the recovering of that City, as if ſome part of their ancient Inheritance had been taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Town,

Town perfidiously usurped by them, restored to her own liberty. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this Expedition, who having wearied his followers with a toilsom Winters journey, returned home without any good or harm done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Army, at Thespies, to infest the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a fooliſh attempt upon the Haven of Athens; which failing to take, he wasted the Country adjoyning, and drave away Cattel, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the war, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly withdraw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flouriſhing Eſtate of Thebes, from the Battel of Leuctra, to the Battel of Mantinæa.

How Thebes and Athens joyned together againſt Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themſelves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The Battel of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatneſs.

THe Lacedæmonians were men of great reſolution, and of much gravity in all their proceedings; but one diſhonourable Rule they held, That all reſpects withſtanding the commodity of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which Doctrine, even by the beſt and wiſeſt of them, did greatly blemiſh that Eſtate: but when it was put in execution by inſufficient over-weening men, it ſeldom failed to bring upon them, inſtead of profit unjuſtly expected, both ſhame and loſs. And ſo it befell them in theſe enterprizes of Phœbidas, upon the Caſtle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Piræus. For, howſoever Ageſilaus did ſpoil the Country about Thebes, in which he ſpent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good ſucceſs of ſome attempts, grew ſtronger than they were at the firſt.

The Athenians likewiſe began to look abroad, ſailing to the Iſle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleaſure, and having in ſome fights at Sea prevailed, began, as in the Peloponneſian War, to ſurround Peloponneſus with a Navy; afflicting ſo the Lacedæmonians, that, had not the Thebans by their inſolency wearied their friends, and cauſed them to ſeek for peace, it had been very likely that the end of this War, ſhould have ſoon come to a good end, which nevertheleſs, being proſecuted by the Thebans (who oppoſed at once both theſe two great Eſtates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginnings found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weak Neighbours, not ſparing ſuch as had been dependants upon Athens, and finding themſelves, whileſt engaged in ſuch a War, unable to relieve their complaining friends, reſolved to ſettle the affairs of Greece, by renewing that form of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Perſian. Wherefore they ſent Meſſengers to Thebes, peremptorily ſignifying, That it was their intent to finiſh the War, to which purpoſe they willed the Thebans to ſend Embaſſadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condeſcended, fearing otherwiſe that they ſhould be left out of the Treaty of Peace: which came to paſs, being ſo wrought by the couragious wiſdom of Epaminondas, who underſtood it far better than his Countrymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treaty the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did ſoon agree; but when the Thebans offered to ſwear to the Articles in the name of the Bœotians, Ageſilaus required them to ſwear in their own name, and to leave the Bœotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made anſwer, That the City of Sparta ſhould give example to Thebes by ſetting the Laconians free; for that the Signiory of Bœotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly ſpoken; but was heard with no patience: for Ageſilaus bearing a vehement hatred unto thoſe of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of of Aſia into Greece, and diſappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to atchieve by the Perſian War, did now paſſionately urge that point of ſetting the Bœotians at liberty; and finding it as obſtinately refuſed, he daſht the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the ſame time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta, lay in Phocis, who received command from the Governors of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which he did, and was there ſlain at Leuctra, and with him the Flower of his Army. This Battel of Leuctra, being one of the moſt famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not ſo notable for any circumſtance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it ſelf, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta; but eſpecially, for that after this Battel (between which and the concluſion of the general Peace, there paſſed but twenty days) the Lacedæmonians were never able to recover the ſtrength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and near: whereas contrariwiſe the Thebans, whoſe greateſt ambition had in former times confined it ſelf unto the little Region of Bœotia, did now begin to undertake the leading and command of many people and eſtates, in ſuch wiſe, that ſoon after they brought an Army of threeſcore and ten thouſand ſtrong unto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard War, valiantly endured, advance the affairs of the diſtreſſed, and guide them into the way of Conqueſt, by ſtiffening that reſolution with a manly temper, which wealth and eaſe had through luxury, retchleſneſs, and many other vices or vanities, made ruſty and effeminate.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the Peace of Greece. New troubles hence ariſing. Epaminondas invadeth and waſteth the Territory of Lacedæmon.

THe Athenians refuſing to take advantage of this overthrow fallen upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians, did nevertheleſs finely give them to underſtand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking upon themſelves the maintenance of the Peace lately concluded, which Ageſilaus (perhaps of purpoſe to make benefit of quarrels that might ariſe) had left unperfect, they aſſembled the Deputies of all the eſtates confederated at Athens; where the general liberty of all Towns, as well ſmall as great, was ratified under the ſtile of the Athenians, and their aſſociates. Hereupon began freſh garboils. The Mantinæans, claiming power by this Decree to order their affairs at their own pleaſure, did (as it were) in deſpight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, re-edifie it, and allie themſelves with ſuch of the Arcadians as ſtood worſt affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a ſtrong Nation, conſiſting of many Cities, were diſtracted with factions; ſome deſiring to hold good correſpondency with the Lacedæmonians; ſome to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durſt not give impeachment to the Mantinæans, nor take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till ſuch time as the factions brake out into violence, and each party called in foreign help. Then was an Army ſent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, againſt the Mantinæans, but indeed againſt them both. Ageſilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time ſubdued the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponneſus in favour of the Arcadians, who had, upon expectation of their coming, abſtained from giving Battel to Ageſilaus. The Army of the Spartans being diſmiſſed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians, the Region of Laconia was invaded and ſpoiled: a thing ſo ſtrange, that no Oracle could have found belief if any had foretold it. Almoſt 600 years were ſpent, ſince the Dorians, under the poſterity of Hercules, had ſeized upon Laconia; in all which time the ſound of an Enemies Trumpet was not heard in that Country. Ten years were not fully paſt, ſince all Greece was at the devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Army could once look upon, nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to ſet foot on, ſaving by ſtealth, was all on a light fire, the very ſmoak whereof the women of Sparta were aſhamed to behold. All which indignity notwithſtanding, the Lacedæmonians did not iſſue out of Sparta to fight, but ſought how to preſerve the Town, ſetting at liberty as many of their Heilotes or Slaves, as were willing to bear Arms in defence of the State, and ſomewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians, to give them ſuccour. From Corinth, and ſome Towns of Peloponneſus, they received ſpeedy aſſiſtance; the Athenians came forward more ſlowly, ſo that Epimanondas returned without battel, having rebuilded the City of Meſſene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many ages before had chaſed away to other Countries, poſſeſſing their Territories themſelves.

§. III.

The Compoſition between Athens and Sparta for command in War againſt the Thebans; who again invade and ſpoil Peloponneſus. The unfortunate preſumption of the Arcadians.

THis journey therefore utterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in ſuch wiſe, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raiſed, nor any manner of precedence: but ſending Embaſſadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, unto Athens, they offered to yield the Admiralty to the Athenians, requeſting that they themſelves might be Generals by Land. This had been a compoſition well agreeing with the ſituation and quality of thoſe two Cities; but it was rejected, becauſe the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no mark or eſtimation, in regard of thoſe companies of horſe and foot, whereof the Land-Army was compounded; who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have ſerved under the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authority ſhould be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five days, the Lacedæmonians other five, and ſo ſucceſſively that each of them ſhould have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifeſt, that in this concluſion vain ambition was more regarded than the common profit; which muſt of neceſſity be very ſlowly advanced, where conſultation, reſolution, and performance are ſo often to change hands. This appeared by a ſecond invaſion of Peloponneſus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies ſo unable to impeach them, that having fortified Iſthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done againſt Xerxes, they were driven out of their ſtrength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Country without reſiſtance. But as the Articles of this league between Athens and Sparta did, by dividing the conduct in ſuch manner, diſable the Society, and make it inſufficient to thoſe ends for which it was concluded; ſo the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanity. For the Arcadians conſidering their own numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many tryals that their people were not inferiour to others in ſtrength of body, in courage, or in good Souldierſhip, thought it good reaſon that they ſhould in like manner ſhare the Government, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwayes continue followers of others, by increaſing whoſe greatneſs they ſhould ſtrengthen their own yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themſelves very inſolently, whereby they grew hateful to their Neighbours, and ſuſpected of the Thebans in an ill time. For, a motion of general peace having been made (which took not effect, becauſe the City Meſſene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprize of the Spartans and their friends was upon theſe Arcadians, who relying too much upon their own worth, were overthrown in a great battel, their calamity being as pleaſing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IV.

The great growth of the Theban Eſtate. Embaſſages of the Greeks to the Perſian; with the reaſons why he moſt favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Perſian Empire. The fruitleſs iſſue of the Embaſſages.

THe Thebans, eſpecially rejoyced at the Arcadians misfortune, conſidering, that without their aid, the ſucceſs of all enterprizes proved ſo ill; whereas they themſelves had by their own power accompliſhed very well whatſoever they took in hand, and were become not only victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but Patrons over the Theſſalonians, and moderators of great quarrels that had riſen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdom, as pleaſed them beſt, they carried Philip the Son of Amyntas, and father of Alexander the Great, as an Hoſtage unto Thebes. Having therefore obtained ſuch reputation, that little ſeemed wanting to make them abſolute Commanders of all Greece, they ſought means of alliance with the Perſian King, to whom they ſent Embaſſador the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whoſe reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they deſired; whereof two eſpecial points were, That Meſſene ſhould remain free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians ſhould forbear to ſend their ſhips of War to Sea; only the

the latter of theſe two was ſomewhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did alſo ſend their Embaſſadors at the ſame time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how far it concerned him to maintain a ſure party in Greece, did upon many weighty conſiderations reſolve to bind the Thebans firmly unto him; juſtly expecting, that their greatneſs ſhould be on that ſide his own ſecurity. The Athenians had been ancient Enemies to his Crown; and having turned the profit of their victories upon the Perſians to the purchaſe of a great Eſtate in Greece, maintained their Signiory in ſuch puiſſant manner, that (ſundry grievous misfortunes notwithſtanding) they had endured a terrible War, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by moſt of the Greeks, and ſupplied with treaſure, and all ſorts of aid by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquiſh them till their own indiſcretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious over Athens, had no ſooner eſtabliſhed their Dominion at home, than they undertook the Conqueſt of Aſia, from which though by the commotion raiſed in Greece with Perſian gold, they were called back, yet having renewed their power, and ſetled things in Greece, it was not unlikely, that they ſhould upon the next advantage have purſued the ſame enterprize, had not they been empeached by this Theban War. But the Thebans contrariwiſe had always diſcovered a good affection to the Crown of Perſia. They had ſided with Xerxes in his invaſion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians againſt Athens: And finally, having offered much contumely to Ageſilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making War on the Confederates of Sparta. Beſides all theſe their good deſervings, they were no Seamen, and therefore unlikely to look abroad; whereupon if perchance they ſhould have any deſire; yet were they diſabled by the want of good Haven-Towns; which they could not ſeize upon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving liberty to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condeſcend unto the requeſts of Pelopidas, as far forth as he might, without giving open defiance to the reſt of Greece; and by that mean he purchaſed his own quiet, being never afterward moleſted by that Nation in the lower Aſia. The ill means which the Greeks had to diſturb Artaxerxes, was very beneficial to the Eſtate of Perſia ſhortly after theſe times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritimate Provinces. For had then the affairs of Greece been ſo compoſed, that any one City might without empeachment of the reſt have tranſported an Army to aſſiſt the revolting Satrapæ, or Vice-royes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Myſia, Lycia, Piſidia, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia; humane reaſon can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preſerved from that ruine, which the Divine Counſel had deferred unto the days of Alexander. But this great Conſpiracy of ſo many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting a firm body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in ſhort ſpace diſcuſſed, and vaniſhed like a miſt, without effect: theſe effeminate Aſiatiques, wearied quickly with the travels and dangers incident to War, forſaking the common cauſe, and each man ſtriving to be the firſt, that by treaſon to his company ſhould both redeem the former treaſon to his Prince, and purchaſe withal his own promotion with encreaſe of riches. Of this commotion, which in courſe of time followed ſome actions not as yet related, I have rather choſen to make ſhort mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; but for that it was like a ſudden ſtorm, raſhly commenced, idly followed, and fooliſhly laid down, having made a great noiſe without effect, and having ſmall reference to any other action agreeable; as alſo becauſe in the whole reign of Artaxerxes, from the War of Cyrus to the invaſion of Egypt, I find nothing (this inſurrection, and a fruitleſs journey againſt the Caduſians excepted) worthy of any mention, much leſs of digreſſion from the courſe of the buſineſs in Greece. All, or the moſt of his time paſſed away ſo quietly, that he enjoyed the pleaſures which an Empire ſo great and wealthy could afford unto ſuch an abſolute Lord, with little diſturbance. The troubles which he found were only, or chiefly, Domeſtical; growing out of the hatred which Paryſatis the Queen-Mother bare unto his wife Statira, and to ſuch as had been the greateſt enemies to her Son Cyrus, or gloried in his death: upon whom, when by poyſon and miſchievous practices ſhe had ſatisfied her feminine appetite of revenge, thenceforth ſhe wholly applied herſelf to the Kings diſpoſition, cheriſhing in him the lewd deſire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the perſwaſion, which Princes not endued with an eſpecial grace, do readily entertain; That his own will was the ſupreme law of his ſubjects, and the rule by which all things were to be meaſured and adjudged to be good or evil. In this imaginary happineſs Pelopidas, and the other Embaſſadors of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by ſo much more aſſured than they found him, by how much the concluſion of this Treaty with them, being altogether to his own advantage, did ſeem to promiſe, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the ſame felicity to him and his, or (at the leaſt) a full ſecurity of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But ſuch foundations of eternity laid by mortal men in this tranſitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either ſhaken from heaven, or made vain and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raiſed to full height, by confuſion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Eſtates of Greece that had ſent Embaſſadors to the Perſian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Towns, as well the little as the great, ſhould be ſet at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby ſhould become the Judges of all Controverſies that might ariſe, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being ſolemnly publiſhed at Thebes; in the preſence of Embaſſadors drawn thither from all parts of Greece: when an oath was required for obſervation of the form of peace therein ſet down, a dilatory anſwer was made by the Embaſſadors, who ſaid, that they were ſent to hear the articles, not to ſwear unto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to ſend unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; but in vain. For when the Corinthians had boldly refuſed it, ſaying, that they did not need it; others took courage by their example to do the like, diſappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatneſs, but left them as it found them to relye upon their own ſwords.

How all Greece was divided between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians on the one ſide, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults ariſing in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did ſtand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envy of the others greatneſs drawn all their followers into a cruel and inteſtine War, by which the whole Country, and eſpecially the Eſtates of theſe two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoyn their forces againſt the Thebans, who ſought to make themſelves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the party of theſe ancient Governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in diſlike of thoſe, who by ſtrong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not ſuddenly aſpire without ſome injury and much envy. The City of Thebes abounding with men, whom neceſſity had made warlike, and many Victories in few years had filled with great ſpirits; and being ſo mighty independants, that ſhe had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponneſus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beſide, excepted) under ſuch acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meer Vaſſallage, did hope to bring all Peloponneſus to the like obedience, wherein already ſhe had ſet good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had been always bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themſelves in ancient Nobility Superiors, but were far under them in valour, having been often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of loſing all: which cauſed them to ſuſpect and envy nothing more than the greatneſs and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when ſhe was at reſt, and had leiſure to bend her whole force againſt them; but firmly joyning with her enemies whenſoever they found her entangled in a difficult War. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, ſure friends of Thebes, ſo the Arcadians, tranſported with a great opinion of their own worthineſs, had formerly renounced and provoked againſt them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtful adherents to the Thebans. In which regard, it was thought convenient by Epaminondas and the State of Thebes, to ſend an Army into Peloponneſus, before ſuch time as theſe wavering friends ſhould fall further off, and become either Neutral, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And ſurely great cauſe there was to ſuſpect the worſt of them, conſidering that without conſent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very ſtrange, and ſeemed no leſs to the Athenians themſelves, who holding a firm league with Sparta at the ſame time when the Arcadians treated with them, did nevertheleſs accept this new Confederacy, not relinquiſhing the old, becauſe they found that howſoever theſe Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they ſhould hereby hereby be drawn ſomewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponneſus with a ſtrong Army. But this did rather haſten, than by any means ſtay the coming of Epaminondas; who finding the way ſomewhat more clear for him (becauſe the City of Corinth, which lay upon the Iſthmus, and had been adverſe to Thebes, was now, by miſeries of this grievous War, driven to become Neutral) took occaſion hereby, and by ſome diſorders among the Arcadians, to viſit Peloponneſus with an Army, conſiſting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had riſen in Arcadia about conſecrated money, which many principal men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publick uſes. In compounding the differences grown upon this occaſion, ſuch as had leaſt will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captain of ſome Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take priſoners many of their Countrymen, as people deſirous of innovation. This was done, but the uproar thereby cauſed was ſo great, that the priſoners were forthwith enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Arms, with much ado ſcarce pacified. When complaint of the Captains proceedings came to Thebes, Epimanondas turned all the blame upon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be ſhortly among them to judge of their fidelity, by the aſſiſtance which they ſhould give him, in that War which he intended to make in Peloponneſus. Theſe Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aid of ſo mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently ſuſpect that great preparation to be made againſt themſelves. Hereupon ſuch of them as had before ſought means to ſettle the affairs of their Country, by drawing things to ſome good concluſion of peace, did now forthwith ſend to Athens for help, and withall diſpatched ſome of the principal among them as Embaſſadors to Sparta, by whom they offered themſelves to the common defence of Peloponneſus, now ready to be invaded. This Embaſſage brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, againſt whom they well knew, that all their forces, and beſt proviſions, would be no more than very hardly ſufficient. Forbearing therefore to diſpute about prerogatives, they (who had been accuſtomed unto ſuch a ſupremacy, as they would in no wiſe communicate with the powerful City of Athens, till other hope of ſecuring their own Eſtate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yield to the Arcadians, that the command of the Army in chief, ſhould be given for the time, to that City in whoſe Territory it lay.

A terrible Invaſion of Peloponneſus by Epaminondas.

CErtain it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm conſent, and uniform care of the common ſafety. For, beſide the great forces raiſed out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives and Meſſenians prepared with all their ſtrength to joyn with Epaminondas; who having lyen a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, received their intelligence, that the Army coming from Athens would paſs by Sea, whereupon he diſlodged, and came to Tegea, which City, and the moſt of all Arcadia beſides, forthwith declared themſelves his. The common opinion was, that the firſt attempt of the Thebans, would be upon ſuch of the Arcadians as had revolted; which cauſed the Lacedæmonian Captains to fortifie Mantinæa with all diligence, and to ſend for Ageſilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that ſmall force of able men which remained in the Town, they might be ſtrong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held ſo good eſpial upon his Enemies, that, had not an unknown fellow brought haſty advertiſement of his purpoſe to Ageſilaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinæa, the City of Sparta had ſuddenly been taken. For thither with all ſpeed and ſecrecy did the Thebans march, who had ſurely carried the City, notwithſtanding any defence that could have been made by that handful of men remaining within it, but that Ageſilaus in all flying haſte got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the reſcue as faſt it was able. The arrival of the Lacedæmonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas, of taking Sparta, ſo it preſented him with a fair advantage upon Mantinæa. It was the time of Harveſt, which made it very likely, that the Mantinæans, finding the War to be carried from their walls into another quarter, would uſe the commodity of that vacation, by fetching in their Corn, and turning out their Cattel into the fields, whilſt no enemy was near, that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantinæa, ſending ſending his horſemen before him, to ſeize upon all that might be found without the City. The Mantinæans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were ſcattered abroad in the Country, far more intent upon their Harveſt buſineſs, than upon the war, whereof they were ſecure, as thinking themſelves out of diſtance. By which preſumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattel, being unable to recover the Town, were in a deſperate caſe; and the Town it ſelf in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy ſhould have taken all their proviſion of victuals, with ſo many of the people as had not over-dearly been redeemed, by that Cities returning to ſociety with Thebes. But at the ſame time, the Athenians coming to the ſuccour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantinæa were very earneſtly entreated by the Citizens to reſcue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were poſſible by any couragious adventure to deliver thoſe who otherwiſe were given as loſt. The Thebans were known at that time to be the beſt Souldiers of all the Greeks, and the commendation of good Horſemanſhip had always been given to the Theſſalians, as excelling in that quality all other Nations; yet the regard of honour ſo wrought upon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their City, which had entred into this War upon no neceſſity of her own, but only in deſire of relieving her diſtreſſed friend, they iſſued forth of Mantinæa, not abiding ſo long as to refreſh themſelves, or their Horſes, with meat; and giving a luſty charge upon the enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long and hot fight, they remained Maſters of the field, giving by this Victory a ſafe and eaſie retrait to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Bœotians arrived in the place ſoon after this Battel, whom the Lacedæmonians and their aſſiſtants were not far behind.

EPaminondas, conſidering that his Commiſſion was almoſt now expired, and that his attempts of ſurprizing Sparta and Mantinæa having failed, the impreſſion of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponneſians, would ſoon vanquiſh, unleſs by ſome notable act he ſhould abate their courage in their firſt growth, and leave ſome memorable character of his Expedition, reſolved to give them Battel, whereby he reaſonably hoped both to ſettle the doubtful affections of his own Aſſociates, and to leave the Spartans as weak in ſpirit and ability, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into ſubjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that Battel, wherein Victory ſhould be rewarded with Lordſhip of all Greece; and finding the alacrity of his Souldiers to be ſuch as promiſed the accompliſhment of his own deſire; he made ſhew of declining the enemy, and entrenching himſelf in a place of more advantage, that ſo by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their valour, and afterward ſtrike their ſenſes with amazement, when he ſhould come upon them unexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in ſo great and ſudden a danger, the enemy ran to Arms, neceſſity enforcing their reſolution, and the conſequence of that days ſervice, urging them to do as well as they might. The Theban Army conſiſted of thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; the Lacedæmonians and their friends were ſhort of this number, both in horſe and in foot, by a third part. The Mantinæans (becauſe the War was in their Country) ſtood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians; the Athenians had the left wing; the Achæans, Eleans, and others of leſs account, filled the body of the Army. The Thebans ſtood in the left wing of their own Battel, oppoſite to the Lacedæmonians, having by them the Arcadians, the Eubœans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Meſſenians, and Theſſalians, with others, compounding the main Battel; the Argives held the right wing, the horſemen on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troop of the Eleans were in the rear. Before the footmen could joyn, the encounter of the horſe on both ſides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithſtanding the valiant reſiſtance of the Athenians: who, not yielding to the enemy either in courage or skill, were overlaid with numbers, and ſo beaten upon by Theſſalian ſlings, that they were driven to forſake the place, and leave their infantery naked. But this retrait was the leſs diſgraceful, becauſe they kept themſelves together, and did not fall back upon their own footment; but finding the Theban horſe to have given them over, and withal diſcovering ſome Companies of foot, which had been ſent about by Epimanondas, to charge their Battel in the rear, they brake upon them, routed them, them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean ſeaſon the Battel of the Athenians had not only to do with the Argives, but was hardly preſſed by the Theban Horſemen, in ſuch wiſe that it begun to open, and was ready to turn back, when the Elean ſquadron of Horſe came up to the relief of it, and reſtored all on that part. With far greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meet, theſe contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; ſo that equal courage, and equal loſs on both ſides made the hope and appearance of Victory to either equally doubtful: unleſs perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firm abiders, might ſeem the more likely to prevail, as having born the firſt brunt and fury of the on-ſet, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by diſcipline, as it were by Nature, to excel in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few years, cannot be thought to have gotten a habit ſo ſure and general. But Epaminondas perceiving the obſtinate ſtiffneſs of the Enemies to be ſuch, as neither the bad ſucceſs of their own horſe, nor all the force of the Bœotian Army, could abate ſo far, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choice company of the moſt able men, whom he caſt into the form of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure againſt a ſquadron, and by his own exceeding virtue, accompanied with the great ſtrength and reſolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleave the whole Battel in deſpight of all reſiſtance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may juſtly be ſaid to have carried the Victory, ſeeing that they remained Maſters of the ground whereon the Battel was fought, having driven the Enemy to lodge farther off. For that which was alledged by the Athenians, as a token that the Victory was partly theirs, the ſlaughter of thoſe Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behind their Army, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a ceremony regardable only among the Greeks, and ſerved meerly for oſtentation, ſhewing that by the fight they had obtained ſomewhat, which the enemy could not get from them otherwiſe than by requeſt. But the Thebans arrived at the general immediate end of the battel; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifeſt confeſſion is expreſſed from them, who forſook the place which they had choſen or accepted, as indifferent for trial of their ability and proweſs. This was the laſt work of the incomparable virtue of Epimanondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troop of men, which broke the Lacedæmonians ſquadron, and forced it to give back in diſaray, was furiouſly charged on the ſudden, by a deſperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, he nevertheleſs, with a ſingular courage, manitained the fight, uſing againſt the enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his own body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he received ſo violent a ſtroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the iron and piece of the trunchion in his breaſt. Hereupon he ſunk down, and was ſoon conveyed out of the fight by his friends; having by his fall ſomewhat animated the Spartans (who fain would have got his body) but much more inflamed with revengeful indignation, the Thebans, who raging at his heavy miſchance, did with great ſlaughter compel their diſordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed not the chaſe, being wearied more with the ſadneſs of this diſaſter, than with all the travel of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Phyſicians, that when the head of the Dart ſhould be drawn out of his body, he muſt needs dye. Hearing this, he called for his ſhield, which to have loſt, was held a great diſhonor: It was brought unto him. He bade them tell him, which part had the Victory; anſwer was made, that the Bœotians had won the field. Then ſaid he, It is a fair time for me to dye; and withal ſent for Iolidas and Diophontes, two principal men of War, that were both ſlain: which being told him, he adviſed the Thebans to make peace, whilſt with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to diſcharge the office of a General. Herewithal he willed, that the head of the weapon ſhould be drawn out of his body, comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of iſſue, by telling them, that the Victories of Leuctra and Mantinæa were two fair daughters, in whom his memory ſhould live.

So died Epaminondas, the worthieſt man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countrey: for he equalled all others in the ſeveral virtues, which in each of them were ſingular. His Juſtice and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wiſdom, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferiour to his Military virtue; in every part whereof he ſo excelled, that he could not properly be called a Wary, a Valiant, a Politick, a Bountiful, or an Induſtrious, and a Provident Captain. Neither ther was his private converſation unanſwerable to thoſe high parts, which gave him praiſe abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; reſolute in publick buſineſs, but in his own particular eaſie, and of much mildneſs: a lover of his people, bearing with mens infirmities, witty and pleaſant in ſpeech, far from inſolence. Maſter of his own affections, and furniſhed with all qualities that might win and keep love. To theſe graces were added great ability of body, and much Eloquence, and very deep knowledge in all parts of Philoſophy and Learning, wherewith his mind being enlightened, reſted not in the ſweetneſs of Contemplation, but brake forth into ſuch effects as gave unto Thebes, which had evermore been an underling, a dreadful reputation among all people adjoyning, and the higheſt command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the Peace concluded in Greece after the Battel of Mantinæa. The Voyage of Ageſilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the compariſon made between him and Pompey the Roman.

THis Battel of Mantinæa was the greateſt that had ever been fought in that Countrey between the Naturals; and the laſt. For at Maranthon, and Platæa, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard trial to the Grecian valour; neither were the practice of Arms and Art Military, ſo perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponneſian War, as long continuance, and daily exerciſe had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, thoſe excepted, which were undertaken againſt foreign enemies, proving for the moſt part unfortunate. But in this laſt fight all Greece was intereſſed, which never had more able ſouldiers and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for Victory with greater care of the ſucceſs, or more obſtinate reſolution. All which, notwithſtanding, the iſſue being ſuch as hath been related, it was found beſt for every particular Eſtate, that a general Peace ſhould be eſtabliſhed, every one retaining what he preſently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Meſſenians were by name comprized in this new league; which cauſed the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their ſtanding out hindred not the reſt from proceeding to concluſion, conſidering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neigbours, and therefore might well be allowed to ſhew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it ſelf in execution. This Peace, as it gave ſome breath and refreſhing to all the Country, ſo to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leiſure to ſeek after wealth by foreign employment in Egypt, whither Ageſilaus was ſent with ſome ſmall Forces to aſſiſt, or indeed, as a Mercenary, to ſerve under Tachos King of Egypt in his War upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a Voluntary, with ſuch Forces as he could raiſe, by entreaty, and offer of good pay, to the ſame ſervice. Theſe Egyptian Kings deſcended from Amyrtæus of Sais, who rebelled againſt Darius Nothus, having retained the Country, notwithſtanding all inteſtine diſſentions, and foreign invaſions, during three Generations of their own race, were ſo well acquainted with the valour of the Greeks, that by their help (eaſily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not only to aſſure themſelves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoyning, which were held by the Perſian. What the iſſue of this great enterprize might have been, had it not fallen by Domeſtical Rebellion, it is uncertain. But very likely it is, that the Rebellion it ſelf had ſoon come to nothing, if Ageſilaus had not proved a falſe Traytor, joyning with Nectanebus, who roſe againſt his Prince, and helping the Rebel with that Army which the money of Tachos had waged. This falſhood Ageſilaus excuſed, as tending to the good of his own Countrey, though it ſeem rather, that he grudged becauſe the King took upon himſelf the conduct of the Army, uſing his ſervice only as Lieutenant, who had made full account of being appointed the General. Howſoever it came to paſs, Tachos being ſhamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had repoſed his chief confidence, fled unto the Perſian, who upon his ſubmiſſion gave him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who ſeems to have been the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his ſtead. At the ſame time the Citizens of Mendes had ſet up another King; to whom all, or moſt of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Ageſilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed ſo far, that he left Nectanebus in quiet poſſeſſion of the Kingdom; who in recompence of his Treaſon to the former King Tachos, and good ſervice done to himſelf, rewarded him with two hundred and thirty Talents of ſilver, with which booty ſailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, valiant, and a good Leader in War, free from covetouſneſs, and not reproached with any blemiſh of luſt; which praiſes are the leſs admirable in him, for that the diſcipline of Sparta was ſuch as did endue every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent ſtream of an ill nature) with all, or the chief of theſe good qualities. He was nevertheleſs very arrogant, perverſe, unjuſt and vain-glorious, meaſuring all things by his own will, and obſtinately proſecuting thoſe courſes, whoſe ends were beyond hope. The Expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Perſia ſhould be overthrown; with which conceit being tranſported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did ever after bear ſuch hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Eſtate by meer neceſſity to grow warlike, and able, to the utter diſhonour of Sparta, and the irrepayarble loſs of all her former greatneſs. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good friend, have cauſed Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance againſt Pompey the great; whoſe actions (the ſolemn gravity of carriage excepted) are very diſproportionble. Yet we may truly ſay, That as Pompey made great Wars under ſundry Climates, and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of employments all that were before him; ſo Ageſilaus had at one time or other ſome quarrel with every Town in Greece, had made a War in Aſia, and medled in the buſineſs of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predeceſſors: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey never took. Herein alſo they were very like; Each of them was the laſt great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Country by his own Lordly wilfulneſs. We may therefore well ſay, Similia magis omnia quam paria; the reſemblance was nearer than the equality. Indeed the freedom of Rome was loſt with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæſar, whom he had inforced to take Arms; yet the Roman Empire ſtood, the form of Government only being changed: But the liberty of Greece, or Sparta it ſelf, was not forfeited unto the Thebans, whom Ageſilaus had compelled to enter into a Victorious War; yet the Signiory, and ancient renown of Sparta was preſently loſt; and the freedom of all Greece being wounded in the Theban War, and after much blood loſt, ill healed by the Peace enſuing, did very ſoon, upon the death of Ageſilaus, give up the ghoſt, and the Lordſhip of the whole Country was ſeized by Philip King of Macedon, whoſe actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporary paſſages of things, in any other Nation.

THE FOVRTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings Reigned in Macedon before Philip.

THE Greeks of whom we have already made large diſcourſe, not as yet wearied with inteſtine War, nor made wiſe by their vain contention for ſuperiority, do ſtill, as in formertimes, continue the invaſion and vaſtation of each other.

Againſt Xerxes, the greateſt Monarch of that part of the world, they defended their liberty, with as happy ſucceſs as ever Nation had, and with no leſs honour, than hath ever been acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a tryal and experience more than fortunate, againſt thoſe Nations, they ſo little regarded what might come from them, who had ſo often forfeited the reputation of their Forces, as whatſoever could be ſpared from their own diſtraction at home, they tranſported over the Helleſpont, as ſufficient, to entertain and buſie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the world, that they underfal, and periſh by the hands and harms which they leaſt fear; ſo fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to ſpeak) they had ſo little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the faſt-growing greatneſs of ſuch a Neighbour-King, ſhould, in regard of their own ſafeties, have ſerved them for a ſtrong argument of union and accord. But the glory of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which sate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakned them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Grecians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover their own, much less to work any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophy to consider, That all great alterations are, storm-like, sudden and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once swollen, fast-running, and inraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking down those defences which stood between them and this inundation, than seek to rampire and re-enforce their own fields, which by the Level of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius:

Oros. l. 3. cap. 12. Græciæ Civitates imperare singulæ cupiunt, imperium omnes perdiderunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdom of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the son of Osirin, or, as other Authors affirm, of Jupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west by Thessaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by Nation Argives; who are listed as followeth. About some six years after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Ambaces then governing Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle to lead a Colony into Macedon, departed thence with many people: and as he was marching through that Countrey, the weather being rainy and tempestuous, he espied a great herd of Goats, which fled the storm as fast as they could, hasting them to their known place of covert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to mind, that he had also

Paul. Dion. Conf. Theop. Antio 6. by another Oracle been directed, to follow the first troop of beasts, that should either lead him, or flie before him; he pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edassa, and being undiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darkness of the air, he entred their City without resistance, and possest it. Soon after this, by the overthrow of Cissius, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty years. Cœnus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelve years. Tyrimas followed Cœnus, and ruled eight and twenty years. Euseb. in Chro.

Perdiccas the first, the son of Tyrimas governed one and fifty years: a Prince, for his great valour and many other virtues, much renowned: Solinus, Pliny, Justine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others, affirm, that he appointed a place of burial for himself, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successors, at Ægæ: assuring them, that the Kingdom should so long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posterity of the Temenedæ failed in him: a thing rather devised after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdiccas. Sol. c. 14. Plin. l. 4. c. 10.

Argæus succeeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Philip the first, his successor, reigned eight and twenty years. Euseb. in Chro.

Æropus followed Philip, and governed six and twenty years: in whose infancy the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victory, they pursued the same to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recover their former loss or to lose at once both their Kingdom and their King, they carried him with them in his cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten, (their King being present) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natural Lord, being an Infant, and no way (but by the hands of his servants) able to defend himself from destruction. The like is reported by Aimonius of Clotarius the son of Fredegunda. Euseb. Justin. Ammian. Theo. Ant. &c. Aimon. l. 3. c. 81.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twenty years.

Amyntas the first, succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fifty years; He lived a such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his unprosperous return out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Army into Europe, who in Darius name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supream Lord, by yielding unto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you have heard before, were for their insolent behaviour toward the Macedonian Ladies, slain by the direction of Alexander, who was the son of Amyntas, and his Successor. Her. Eus. Just. &c.

Alexander sirnamed the Rich, the son of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and forty years. He did not only appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors by giving Gygæa his Sister, to Eubares of the blood of Persia; but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdom of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made General of the Persian Army; Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Her. l. 8. Plut. Eusib. Just. &c.

Perdiccas the second, the son of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian War, and reigned in all eight and twenty years. The wars which he made were not much remarkable: the Story of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first six Books. He left behind him two sons; Perdiccas, who was very young; and Archelaus, who was base-born.

Perdiccas the third, being delivered to the custody and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra [the Mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misadventure. But Archelaus stayed not here: for having thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Uncle Alcetas the son of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the son of this Alcetas, his Cousin Germain, and enjoyed the Kingdom of Macedon himself four and twenty years.

Plat. in Gorg. Arist. in Pol. 5.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himself King by wicked murder, yet performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his Father; and having reigned seven years, he was slain in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose, by Crateus.

Orestes his younger son was committed to the education of Æropus of the Royal blood of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupil; for Æropus murthered him and usurped the Kingdom, which he held some six years: the same who denied passage to Agesilaus King of Sparta, who desired, after his return from the Asian expedition, to pass by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This Usuper left three sons, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Æropus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserved, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his Brother Perdiccas; his Uncle Alcetas, and his son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twenty years; for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his Brother Argæus, incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two years dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours near the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chief City of Macedon.

Diod. Polyæn. Plut. in Demet.

Amyntas the second, had by his wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three sons; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great: and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had also by his second wife Gygæa, three Sons; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slain by their Brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomy sirnamed Alorites, of the City of Alorus, wherein he was born.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias, the son of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of mony) to leave his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alevadæ against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessaly, having redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into Confederacy with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrey, with whom he also left Philip with divers other principal persons, for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in love with her Son in Law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practised the death of Alexander her son, with a purpose to confer the Kingdom on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof, he held Macedon for three years, but was soon after slain by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath

Diod. l. 15. & 16. hath it otherwiſe of Philip being made pledge; and ſaith, That Amyntas his Father delivered him for hoſtage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yet living) was firſt ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for hoſtage a ſecond time by Alexander his brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had ſlain Alorites his baſe Brother, governed Macedon five years, and was then ſlain in a Battel againſt the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Juſtin affirmeth, that he periſhed by the practice of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did. Juſt. l. 7.

§. II.

The beginning of Philip's Reign: and how he delivered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it intangled.

PHilip the ſecond, the youngeſt ſon of Amyntaas by Eurydice, having been inſtructed in all knowledge requiſite unto the Government of a Kingdom, in that excellent education which he had under Epaminondas, making an eſcape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the firſt year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourſcore and thirteen years: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdom was invironed, he took on him, not as a King (for Perdiccas left a ſon, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of War. Yet his fruitful ambition ſoon over-grew his modeſty, and he was eaſily perſwaded by the people to accept both the title of King, and withall, the abſolute rule of the Kingdom. And, to ſay the truth, the neceſſity of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, beſides the incurſions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did ſet up in oppoſition Pauſanias; the Athenians, Argæus; ſon of the late Uſurper, Æropus: each of theſe labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own election. Theſe heavy burdens when Philip could not well bear, he bought off the weightieſt by mony, and by fair promiſes unloaded himſelf of ſo many of the reſt, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithſtanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with four thouſand Macedonians, beſide thoſe that were wounded and taken priſoners; and that the Pannonians were deſtroying all before them in Macedon; Diod. l. 16. and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thouſand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat upon him on all ſides and quarters of his Country: yet after he had practiſed the men of War of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gifts; and had alſo bought the King of Thrace from Pauſanias, he forthwith made head againſt the Athenians his ſtiffeſt enemies; and, for the firſt, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a City on the frontier of Macedon: and did then purſue Argæus, the ſon of Æropus, ſet againſt him by the Athenians, and followed him ſo hard at the heels, in his retrait from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battel: which Argæus loſt, having the greateſt part of his Army ſlain in the place. Thoſe of the Athenians, and others which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a ſtrong piece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the preſent fury of the Souldiers, they obtained of the Vanquiſhers life and liberty to return into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded between him and the Athenians for that preſent, and for this clemency he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greeks.

§. III.

The good ſucceſs which Philip had in many enterprizes.

NOw had Philip leiſure to look Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pæonians, his irreconcileable Enemies and borderers: both which he invaded with ſo proſperous ſucceſs, as he ſlew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with ſeven thouſand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all thoſe places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withal, upon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc'd that Country, and after a main Victory obtained, he enforc'd them to pay him tribute. This was no ſooner done, than (without ſtaying to take longer breath) he haſted ſpeedily towards Lariſſa, upon the River Peneus in Theſſaly, of which Town he ſoon made himſelf Maſter; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made uſe in time following. Now although he reſolved either to ſubdue the Theſſalians, or to make them his own againſt all others, becauſe the horſe men of that Country were the beſt, and moſt feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it moſt for his ſafety to cloſe up the entrances out of Thrace, leſt while he invaded Theſſaly and

Greece

Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or over-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous river of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon; and won it. He also recovered Pynda, and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus) and called it after his name, Philippi: to the people whereof, Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips affairs, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make six hundred thousand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies, the Olynthians; whom the better to fasten unto him, he gave them the City of Pynda with the territory, meaning nothing less than that they should enjoy it, or their own Estate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greeks, he took the fair occasion to deliver the City of Pheres in Thessaly, from the Tyrants Lycophron and Tisiphonus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who usurped upon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for ever after fasten the Thessalians unto him, and, to his exceeding great advantage, binde them to his service.

§. IV.

Of the Phocian War which first drew Philip into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the second year of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight years after the Battel of Mantinæa, and about the eighth year of Artaxerxes Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concur towards the execution of eternal providence, and of every great alteration in the World, there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this revengeful hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with half a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themselves, beating down their own defences, to give him an easie passage; and beating themselves, to give him Victory without peril; left nothing unperformed towards their own slavery, saving the title and imposition. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their Victory at Leuctra) were the inflamers. For at the Council of the Amphyctiones, or of the general Estates of Greece, in which at that time they swayed most, they caused both the Lacedæmonians and Phocians to be condemned in greater sums of money than they could well bear; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on, and encouraged by the Lacedæmonians: and for refusal were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accursed to all their neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawful to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captain of their own, cast the same dice of hazard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their own Nation. And the better to bear out an ungracious quarrel, of which there was left no hope of composition, they resolved to sack the Temple it self. For seeing that for the ploughing of a piece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-god, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befal them than already was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevail against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they took out of the Temple in the beginning of the War, was ten thousand talents, which in those days served them to wage a great many men; and such was their success in the beginning of the War, as they won three great battels against the Thebans, Thessalians and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himself headlong over the Rocks.

In the mean while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselves against their bad neighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their quarrel, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Methone lost one of his eyes. It is said, ſaid, That he that ſhot him, did purpoſely direct his arrow toward him, and that it was written on the ſhaft thereof: After Philippo; After to Philip: for ſo he was called that gave him the wouud. This City he evened with the ſoil.

Plut. in ultian. Strab. l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was buſied on the border of Thrace, and the Theſſalians ingaged in the holy War, entred Theſſaly with new Forces, being aſſiſted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Army, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped ſo to entertain the Theſſalians at home, as they ſhould not find leiſure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the ſecond time called into Theſſaly; but both the Theſſalians and Macedonians (Philip being preſent) were utterly overthrown by Onomarchus, and great numbers of both Nations loſt. From Theſſaly, Onomarchus drew ſpeedily towards Bœotia, and with the ſame Victorious Army brake the forces of the Bœotians, and took from them their City of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late miſadventure, after he had re-enforced his Army, returned with all ſpeed into Theſſaly, there to find again the honour which he lately loſt: and was the ſecond time encountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twenty thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe. All this great preparation ſufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip ſurmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Army overturned, ſix thouſand ſlain, and three thouſand taken: of which number himſelf being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Thoſe that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which ſailed along the coaſt, commanded by Cares; but the greateſt number of thoſe that took the Sea, were therein devoured ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now again driven out of Theſſaly, and Pheres made free as before.

§. V.

Of the Olynthian War. The ambitious practices of Philip.

FRom hence Philip reſolved to invade Phocis it ſelf, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into thoſe parts; and therefore with the help of the Lacedæmonians, they retrench'd his paſſage at the Streits of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very ſtrong, and had evermore both braved and beaten the Macedonians. It is ſaid, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his half brother (for Amyntas had three ſons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other ſons by Gygæa: but Philips elder Brother by the ſame Mother being dead, he determined to rid himſelf alſo of the reſt) the two younger held themſelves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cauſe of the War, Juſtine affirmeth. Juſt quarrels are ballanced by juſt Princes, but to this King all things were lawful that might ſerve his turn; all his affections, and paſſions, how divers ſoever in other men, were in his ambition ſwallowed up, and thereinto converted. For he neither forbare the murder of his own brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelity: he eſteemed no place ſtrong where his Aſs loaden with gold might enter; nor any City or State unconquerable, where a few of the greateſt, to be made greater, could loſe the ſenſe of other mens ſorrow and ſubjection. And becauſe he thought it vain to practiſe the winning of Olynthus, till he had incloſed all the power they had within their own walls; he entred their Territory, and by the advantage of a well-compounded and trained Army, he gave them two overthrows ere he ſate down before the City it ſelf: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Laſthenes from their people, and from the ſervice of their Countrey and Common-weale, by whoſe treaſon he entred the Town, ſlew his brothers therein, ſackt it, and ſold the Inhabitants for ſlaves by the drum. By the ſpoil of this place he greatly enriched himſelf, and had treaſure ſufficient to buy-in other Cities withal, which he daily did. For ſo was he adviſed by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he ſhould make his aſſaults with ſilver ſpears: Whereupon Horace well and truly ſaid,

—— Diffidit Urbium
Portas vir Macedo, & ſubruit æmulos
Reges muneribus.——

Hor. Carm. Od. 16.

By gifts the Macedon clave Gates aſunder,
And Kings envying his eſtate brought under.

And it is true, that he won more by corruption and fraud, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principal Cities of Greece his ſecret workers (which way of Conqueſt was well followed by Philip the ſecond of Spain:) So when in the contention between the the Competitors for the Kingdom of Thrace, he was choſen the Arbitrator; he came not to the Council accompanied with Piety and Juſtice, but with a powerful Army, and having beaten and ſlain both Kings, gave ſentence for himſelf, and made the Kingdom his own.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian War.

THe War ſtill continued between the Phocian and the Aſſociates of the holy War: the Bœotians, finding themſelves unable to ſubſiſt without ſome preſent aid, ſent unto Philip for ſuccour, who willingly yielded to their neceſſities, and ſent them ſuch a proportion of men, as were neither ſufficient to maſter their enemies, nor to aſſure themſelves; but yet to enable them to continue the War, and to waſte the ſtrength of Greece. They alſo ſent to Artaxerxes Ochus for ſupply of treaſure, who lent them thirty talents, which makes a hundred and fourſcore thouſand Crowns: but when with theſe ſupplies they had ſtill the worſt againſt the Phocians, who held from them three of the ſtrongeſt Cities within Bœotia it ſelf, they then beſought Philip of Macedon that he would aſſiſt them in perſon, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandments in War.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himſelf in ſtate to give the law to both, and ſo quitting all his other purpoſes towards the North, he marched with a ſpeedy pace towards Bœotia, where being arrived, Phallechus who commanded the Phocian Army, fearing to ſhock with this victorious King, made his own peace, and withdrew himſelf with a Regiment of eight thouſand Souldiers into Peloponneſus, leaving the Phocians to the mercy of the Conqueror; and for concluſion he had the glory of that War called Sacred, which the Grecians with ſo many mutual ſlaughters had continued for ten years; and, beſides the glory, he poſſeſt himſelf of Orchomene, Coronea, and Corſia, in the Country of the Bœotians, who invited him to be victorious over themſelves. He brought the Phocians into ſervitude, and waſted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabit, reſerving unto himſelf the yearly tribute of threeſcore talents, which make ſix and thirty thouſand French Crowns. He alſo hereby (beſides the fame of piety for ſervice of the gods) obtained the ſame double voice in the Council of the Amphyctiones which the Phocians had, with the ſuperintendency of the Pytian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian ſacrilege.

How Philip with ill ſucceſs attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

PHilip, after his triumphant return into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Army Parmeneo, ſlaughtered many thouſands of the Illyrians and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their Reveuues. But his next enterprize againſt the Perinthians ſtayed his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, ſeated upon Propontis, in the mid-way between Seſtos and Byzantium, a place of great ſtrength, and a people reſolved to defend their liberty againſt Philip, where the Athenians incouraged and aſſiſted them. Philip ſate down before it with a puiſſant Army, made many fair breaches, gave many furious aſſaults, built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equal violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continual aſſauls to weary them, and waſte both their men and munition, they were ſupplied, not only from the Perſian with men and money, and ſuccoured from Byzantium, which ſtood upon the ſame Sea-coaſt, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatſoever was wanting to their neceſſity. But becauſe thoſe of Byzantium by reaſon of their neighbourhood, and eaſie paſſage by water, gave them often and ready help, Philip removed the one half of his Army, and beſieged it, leaving fifteen thouſand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could: But, to be ſhort, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly do that undertake divers enterprizes at one time) and returned into Macedon with no leſs diſhonor than loſs: whereupon he made an overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly deſired it: to which though Phocion perſwaded them all he could, and that by the occaſion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions; yet Demoſthenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refuſal. In the mean while, Philip having digeſted his late affront, and ſupplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred threeſcore and ten Merchants ſhips, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his ſon Alexander, led them into Scythia: but he was alſo unproſperous in that enterprize: For the Triballi, a people of Mœſia, ſet on him in his return, wounded him, and took from him the greateſt part of the ſpoils which he had gathered.

Mœſia,

§. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeks in the battel of Cheronæa, was choſen Captain-General of Greece. The death of Philip.

AMong theſe Northern Nations (part of which he ſuppreſt, and part quieted) he ſpent ſome eight years; and in the ninth year, after the end of the Holy War, he was, by his great advantage, invited again by the Græcians to their aſſiſtance. For the Citizens of Amphiſſa having diſobeyed the decree of Amphyctiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reaſon that the Thebans and Locrians gave countenance and aid to the Amphiſſonians, the reſt were not of themſelves able to conſtrain them, they beſought Philip to come in perſon to their aſſiſtance. Now you muſt think that Philip was not long in reſolving upon this enterpriſe; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keep back; nor other diſſwaſion than a maſtering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the ſame being compounded of thirty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, won Platæa, and brought into ſubjection all that Region.

The reſt, and eſpecially the Athenians, although they had good cauſe to fear that a great part of this ſtorm would fall on themſelves, yet were they diſſwaded by Demoſthenes from accepting ſuch reaſonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawn the Thebans to joyn with them) to leave the enjoying of their eſtates and their freedom to the chance of one battell, than to hold it either by compoſition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence coſt them dear. It is true, that he could far more eaſily mind them of the vertue of their Anceſtors, than make them ſuch as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving paſſion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transform the Macedonians into Perſians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Ariſtides, a Themiſtocles, or a Cimon, or any of thoſe famous Commanders, whoſe great vertues they had payed with the greateſt ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the ſtrength of a contrary faction he was at this time in diſgrace, and not imployed; in ſo much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although ſome thouſands of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-near of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that ſide to hold up the reſt, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gave to Philip ſo ſhining a victory, that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in deſpight of all the Nations interjacent) in Perſia, India, and Egypt; ſo it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Græcian glory; Yea their liberty (ſaith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with ſo many difficulties, continued for ſo many Ages, and ſo often defended againſt the greateſt Kings, was now loſt in a moment, and for ever loſt.

Now this adviſed King (never paſſionate to his diſadvantage) to the end he might obtain the Soveraignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-General againſt the Perſians, without any further hazzard or trouble, was content to let go thoſe Athenians that were taken at this battel of Cheronæa, as he alſo forbare to attempt any thing againſt their City: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed over the reſt) he lodged a Garriſon of Macedonians. And being ſoon after (according unto the long deſire which he had nouriſhed of this Soveraignty) by the general States at Corinth, ſtyled the firſt Commander of all the Græcians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great ſtrength, and under the Commandment of Attalus and Parmenio, tranſported the ſame over the Helleſpont into Aſia, to begin the War. Of his enterpriſe againſt Perſia, he ſought ſucceſs from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received ſuch another convertible riddle, as Cræſus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like ſort miſtaken in the expoſition.

But as it is hard to diſcern and withſtand the flatteries of our own appetites, ſo did Philips ambitious deſire to invade Perſia, abuſe his judgement, ſo far, that the death, wherewith himſelf was threatned, he underſtood to be delivered of his enemy, whom he intended preſently to invade. Before his purpoſed departure into Aſia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feaſt and paſtimes thereat appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principal persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich Presents: but this was indeed the Feast of his Funeral. For, having refused to do justice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had first made drunk, and then left to be carnally abused by divers base persons; this Pausanias grew into so great a detestation of the Kings partiality in so foul a fact, as, when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived six and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Justine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband; which after his death she bodily avowed, by the honour she did unto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his Sword unto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

§. XI.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatness were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities and issue.

NOw although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had seen the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripeness and perfection; yet he was herein happy, that he lived to see his Son Alexander at mans estate, and had himself been an eye-witness of his resolution and singular valour in this last battel.

The foundation of whose future greatness he had laid so soundly for him, with so plain a pattern of the Buildings which himself meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was far more easie to Alexander, though more glorious, than the beginnings unto Philip, though less famous. For, besides the recovery of Macedon it self in competition between him and the Sons of Æropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians; and besides the regaining of many places possest by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the overthrow of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedom; and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it self against the greatest Kings of the World, and won upon them; He left unto his Son, and had bred up for him, so many choice Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and judgement in the War, were no less worthy of Crowns, than himself was that ware a Crown: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, ungratefull to so great vertue, impiously murthered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternal fame, without the King; but the King without Parmenio never did any thing worthy of renown: as for the rest of his Captains, though content to obey the Son of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more Vices, than Nature and his excellent education had enriched him with vertues. For, besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this savour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) we find a good example in his dealing with Arcadion and Nicanor. Whom when for their evil speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death, he answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himself; Secondly, that it was in every mans own power to be well spoken of; and this was shortly proved; for after Philip relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdom that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to use violence, that he was a better Physitian for evil speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his Son are remembred by Cicero and Gellius; and by Dion and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyænus and Erontinus; his wise sayings, by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his own right, all the time of his reign, yet was he not the true and next Heir thereof; for Amyntas the Son of his Brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the Protection during his infancy) had the the right. This Amyntas he married to his daughter Cyna, who had by him a daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip's baſe Son Aridæus, her Unkle by the Mothers ſide: both which Olympias, Philip's firſt Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridæus by extreme torments, Eurydice ſhe ſtrangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Moloſſians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Bother Alexanders death ſlain at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Audata an Illyrian, his ſecond Wife, he had Cyna, married as is ſhewed before.

By Nicaſipolis, the Siſter of Jaſon, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Theſſalonica, whom Caſſander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but ſhe was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, cauſed to be roſted to death in a Copper Pan. Others lay his murder to Alexander himſelf. By the ſame Cleopatra he had likewiſe a daughter called Europa, whom Olympias alſo murdered at the Mothers breſt.

By Phila and Meda he had no iſſue.

He had alſo two Concubines, Arſinoe, whom after he had gotten with childe, he married to an obſcure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomy King of Egypt, called the Son of Lagus, but eſteemed the Son of Philip: by Philinna, his ſecond Concubine, a publick Dancer, he had Aridæus, of whom we ſhall have much occaſion to ſpeak hereafter.

CHAP. II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great.

§. I.

A brief rehearſal of Alexanders doings, before he invaded Aſia.

Alexander, afterwards called the Great, ſucceeded unto Philip his Father; being a Prince no leſs valiant by Nature, than by Education, well inſtructed, and inriched in all ſorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reign over the Macedonians four hundred and ſeventeen years, after Rome was built, and after his own birth twenty years. The ſtrange dreams of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods in the ſhape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as fooliſh Tales; but, that the Temple of Diana (a work the moſt magnificent of the World) was burnt upon the day of his birth, and that ſo ſtrange an accident was accompanied with the news of three ſeveral Victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very rmarkable, and might with the reaſon of thoſe times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-ſhewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppreſt, began to conſult about the recovery of their former liberty, and to adventure it by force of arms. Alexanders young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his ſuſpected ſeverity increaſed courage in thoſe, who could better reſolve to die, than to live ſlaviſhly. But Alexander gave no time to thoſe ſwelling humours, which might ſpeedily have endangered the health of his Eſtate. For after revenge taken upon the Conſpirators againſt his Father, whom he ſlew upon his Tomb, and the celebration of his Funerals, he firſt faſtened unto him his own Nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily ſlavery, other than their ſervice in his Wars; and uſed ſuch Kingly auſterity towards thoſe that contemned his young years, and ſuch clemency to the reſt that perſwaded themſelves of the cruelty of his diſpoſition, as all affections being pacified at home, he made a preſent journey into Peloponneſus, and ſo well exerciſed his ſpirits among them, as by the Counſel of the States of Greece, he was, according to the great deſire of his heart, elected Captain-General againſt the Perſians, upon which war Philip had not only reſoved, (who had obtained the ſame title of General Commander) but had tranſported under the leading of Parmenio.

menio and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recover some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking; all other thoughts and imaginations were either grievous or hatefull. But a contrary winde ariseth: for he receiveth advertisement, that the Athenians, Thebans and Lacedæmonians, had united themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recovery of their former freedom. Hereunto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himself being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the device he used was more subtile than profitable; for he caused it to be bruited, that Alexander was slain in a battail against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a companion whom he had corrupted, to affirm that himself was present, and wounded in the battail. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a-days defined by falsehood and knavery) that devised rumours and lies, if they serve the turn but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true, Common people are sometimes mockt by them as Souldiers are by false alarums in the wars; but in all that I have observed, I have found the success as ridiculous as the invention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like bruits, do at other times neglect their duties, when they are upon true reports, and in occasions perilous, summoned to assemble; so do all men in general condemn the Venters of such trumpery, and for them, fear upon necessary occasion to entertain the truth it self. This labour unlooked for, and loss of time, was not only very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Græcians, of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to strive against the wind, shall hardly attain the Port which he purposeth to recover: and it no less becometh the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewail them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Revolters, as that himself, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first news of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacifie the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Græcians. Wise men are not easily drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affair, who hath intangled himself in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certain end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agreans, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessors, but even Philip his Father: with all which, after divers Overthrows given them, he made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good success, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more natural to man than liberty: the Greeks had enjoyed it over-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once again. The Thebans, who had in their Cittadell a Garrison of 3000 Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hasteneth to their succour, and presents himself with 30000. foot, all old Souldiers, and 3000. Horse, before the City, and gave the Inhabitants some days to resolve, being even heart-sick with the desire of passing into Asia. So unwilling, indeed, he was to draw blood of the Græcians, by whom he hoped to serve himself elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phœnix and Prothytes, the stirrers up of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) instead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdom of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swayed it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their City taken and razed to the ground, six thousand slain, and thirty thousand sold for slaves, at the price of four hundred and forty Talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Græcian Cities.

Many arguments were used by Cleadas one of the Prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the deſtruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather miſ-led, by giving haſty credit to falſe reports, than any way malicious; for being perſwaded of Alexander's death, they rebelled but againſt his ſucceſſour. He alſo beſought the King to remember, that his Father Philip had his education in that City, yea, that his Anceſtour Hercules was born therein: but all perſwaſions were fruitleſs; the times wherein offences are committed do greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all the race of Pindarus the Poet, and ſpared, and ſet at liberty Timoclea, the Siſter of Theagenes, who dyed in defence of the liberty of Greece againſt his Father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him raviſhed, he threatned to take her life unleſs ſhe would confeſs her treaſure: ſhe led that Thracian to a Well, and told him, that ſhe had therein caſt it: and when the Thracian ſtooped to look into the Well, ſhe ſuddenly thruſt him into the mouth thereof and ſtoned him to death.

Now becauſe the Athenians had received into their City ſo many of the Thebans, as had eſcaped and fled unto them for ſuccour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perſwaded this ſecond revolt, and their Captains; yet in the end, it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprize of Perſia, he was content that the Orators ſhould remain, and accepted of the baniſhment of the Captains; wherein he was exceeding ill-adviſed, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the reſiſtance againſt him unprofitable: for theſe good Leaders of the Græcians betook themſelves to the ſervice of the Perſian, whom after a few dayes he invaded.

§. II.

How Alexander paſſed into Aſia, fought with the Perſians upon the River of Granicus.

WHen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the truſt of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the firſt of the Spring did paſs the Helleſpont, and being ready to diſ-imbark, he threw a Dart towards the Aſian ſhore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waſte in their own Territory, or to burn, or deface thoſe buildings which themſelves were preſently, and in the future to poſſeſs. He landed his Army, conſiſting of two and thirty thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe, all old Souldiers, near unto Troy, where he offered a ſolemn Sacrifice upon Achilles Tomb, his maternal Anceſtor.

But before he left his own coaſt, he put to death, without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-laws Kinſmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not ſparing ſuch of his own as he ſuſpected. He alſo took with him many of his tributary Princes, of whoſe fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjuſt cruelty to aſſure all things, both in the preſent and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the Juſtice of God; for all that he had planted, was ſoon after withered, and rooted up; thoſe, whom he moſt truſted, were the moſt traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by ſuch another mercileſs ſword as his own, and all manner of confuſion followed his dead body to the grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexander's landing on Aſia ſide was brought to Darius, he ſo much ſcorned the Army of Macedon, and had ſo contemptible an opinion of Alexander himſelf, as having ſtiled him his ſervant on a letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his diſloyalty and audacity (for Darius intitled himſelf King of Kings, and the Kinſman of the gods) he gave order withall to his Lieutenants of the leſſer Aſia, that they ſhould take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his preſence: that they ſhould ſink his ſhips, and ſend the Macedons taken priſoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike into Æthiopia, or ſome other unhealthfull part of Africa.

In this ſort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartleſs multitude which he commanded, diſpoſe of the already-vanquiſhed Macedonians: But the ill deſtinies of men bearing them to the ground, by what ſtrong confidence ſoever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heap into the field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any diſcouragement at all. For, beſides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers; men, who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevail againſt thoſe of leſs courage than themſelves; men that took more care how to embroider with gold and ſilver their upper garments, as if they attended the invaſion but of the Sun-beams, than they did to arm themſelves with Iron and Steel againſt the ſharp pikes, ſwords, and darts of the hardy Macedonians; I ſay, beſides all theſe, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turn to fight, filled every one of them with the care of their own ſafety, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their own breath, and that of their Horſes, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themſelves with the Gold and Jewels of Perſia, both which they needed; ſo the Perſians, who expected nothing in that War but blows and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to conſtrain them in aſſembling themſelves for his ſervice; but their own fears and cowardiſe, which in time of danger had moſt power over them, they only then obeyed, when their rebellion againſt ſo ſervile a paſſion did juſtly and violently require it. For, ſaith Vegetius, Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles prælium cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam ſciendum eſt in pugna uſum ampliùs prodeſſe quàm vires. As the well-practiſed Souldier deſires to come to battel, ſo the raw one fears it: for we muſt underſtand, that in fight it more avails to have been accuſtomed unto the like, than only to have rude ſtrength. What manner of men the Perſians were; Alexander diſcovered in the firſt encounter; before which time it is ſaid, by thoſe that write his ſtory, that it was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the Conqueſt of an Empire ſo well peopled, with an handfull of men, or the ſucceſs he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which ſevereth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Perſians ſought to ſtop his paſſage, taking the higher ground and bank of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime up unto, and ſcale from the Level of the water. Great reſiſtance (ſaith Curtius) was made by the Perſians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it ſeems to me, that the Victory then gotten was exceeding eaſie, and that the twenty thouſand Perſian footmen, ſaid to be ſlain, were rather killed in the back, in running away, than hurt in the boſoms by reſiſting. For had thoſe twenty thouſand foot, and two hundred and fifty horſe-men, or, after Plutarch, two thouſand and five hundred horſe-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lives at ſo ſmall a rate, as with the loſs of four and thirty of all ſorts of his own. And if it were alſo true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountred two of the Perſian Commanders, Spithridates and Rœſaches; and that the Perſian horſe-men fought with great fury, though in the end ſcattered; and laſtly, how thoſe Grœcians in Darius his pay, holding themſelves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after mercy was refuſed them) fight it out to the laſt; how then doth it reſemble truth, that ſuch reſiſtance having been made, yet of Alexander's Army there fell but twelve footmen, and two and twenty horſe-men?

§. III.

A digreſſion concerning the defence of hard paſſages, Of things following the Battell of Granick.

THe winning of this paſſage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought ſuch terrour upon all thoſe of the leſſer Aſia, as he obtained all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, ſome one or two Towns excepted. For in all invaſions, where the Nations invaded have once been beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountains, they will ſoon have perſwaded themſelves, that ſuch an enemy upon equal terms and even ground, can hardly be reſiſted. It was therefore Machiavels counſel, That he which reſolveth to defend a paſſage, ſhould with his ableſt force oppoſe the Aſſailant. And to ſay truth, few Regions of any great circuit are ſo well fenced, that Armies of ſuch force as may be thought ſufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the natural difficulty of the wayes. One paſſage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then muſt the forces of the Country be diſtracted; and yet lightly ſome one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, Where ſhall we finde that ever they kept out an Invader? Yet are they ſuch as (to ſpeak briefly) afflict with all difficulties thoſe that travel over them; but they give no ſecurity to thoſe that lye behind them: for they are of too large extent. The Towns of Lombardy perſwaded themſelves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from deſcending into the Dutchy of Milan: but whileſt theſe Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in thoſe Mountains had made fitteſt of all other for ſuch a ſervice, were buſied in cuſtody of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lombardy, ſo much the the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the leſs they had expected his arrival. What ſhall we ſay of thoſe Mountains, which lock up whole Regions in ſuch ſort, as they leave but one Gate open; The Streights, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and thoſe of Thermopylæ, have ſeldom been attempted, perhaps becauſe they were thought impregnable: but how ſeldom (if ever) have they been attempted in vain? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylæ; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how ſtrongly ſoever they had been locked and barred, yet were thoſe Countries open enough to a Fleet that ſhould enter on the back-ſide. The defence of Rivers, how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all hiſtories that bear good witneſs. The deepeſt have many Foords; the ſwifteſt and broadeſt may be paſſed by Boats, in caſe it be found a matter of difficulty to make a bridge. He that hath men enow to defend all the length of his own bank, hath alſo enow to beat his enemy; and may therefore do better to let him come over, to his loſs, than by ſtriving in vain to hinder the paſſage, as a matter tending to his own diſadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill caſe, having their means of ſafeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of ſuch as are too good for them. Certainly, if a River were ſufficient defence againſt an Army, the Iſle of Mona, now called Angleſey, which is divided from North-Wales by an Arm of the Sea, had been ſafe enough againſt the Romans, invading it under the conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to ſpend the time in making Veſſels to tranſport his forces, did aſſay the foords. Whereby he ſo amazed the enemies attending for ſhips and ſuch like proviſion by Sea, that ſurely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came ſo minded to War, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Iſland. Yet the Britains were men ſtout enough, the Perſians were very daſtards.

It was therefore wiſely done of Alexander, to paſs the River of Granick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to ſeek an eaſier way, nor labouring to convey his men over it by ſome ſafer means. For, having beaten them upon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no leſs of their reputation, than of their ſtrength, leaving no hope of ſuccour to the partakers and followers of ſuch unable Protectors.

Soon after this Victory he recovered Sardis, Epheſus, the Cities of the Trallians, and Magneſia, which were rendred unto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, he received with great grace, ſuffering them to be governed by their own Laws. For he obſerved it well; Novum Imperium inchoantibus, utilis clementiæ fama; It is commodious unto ſuch as lay the foundations of a new Soveraignty, to have the fame of being merciſull. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, and by force maſtered Halicarnaſſæus, which becauſe it reſiſted obſtinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queen, who had been caſt out of all that ſhe held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, preſented her ſelf unto him, and adopted him her Son and Succeſſor; which Alexander accepted in ſo gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdom to her diſpoſing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea-coaſts, and, ſubjecting unto him Piſidia, he directed himſelf towards Darius (who was ſaid to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For, all the Province of Aſia the leſs, bordering upon the Sea, his firſt Victory laid under his feet.

While he gave order for the government and ſettling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they ſent Cleander to raiſe ſome new Captains in Peloponneſus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas, ſeated on the River Meander, which was abandoned unto him; the Caſtle only holding out, which alſo after forty dayes was given up: for ſo long time he gave them to attend ſuccour from Darius. From Celenas he paſs'd on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regal Seat, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was, that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to undo, he cut it aſunder with his Sword. For there was an ancient Prophecy did promiſe to him that could untie it, the Lordſhip of all Aſia; whereupon Alexander, not reſpecting the manner how, ſo it were done, aſſumed to himſelf the fulfilling of the Prophecy, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Aſia the leſs towards the eaſt, he took care to clear the Sea-coaſt on his back, and to thruſt the Perſians out of the Iſlands of Lesbos, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captains, giving them ſuch order as he thought to be moſt convenient for that ſervice; and delivering unto unto them fifty Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyl gotten, he sent threescore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenas he removed to Ancira, now called Anguori, standing on the same River of Sangarias, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Army, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedom of tribute: where he left Catus Governour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to pass on towards him; for of this only Captain he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weals, the erection of Monarchies, the Conquest of Kingdoms and Empires, guided handfulls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contrived victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearfull passions of his own followers into magnanimity, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits have been stirred up in sundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast down again, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certain ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Universal, piercing, moving, and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly, the things that this King did, were marvellous, and would hardly have been undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would have contented himself with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Inaus, as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran over so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may justly be imputed unto this, that he was never encountred by an equal spirit, concurring with equal power against him. Hereby it came to pass that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desart places, and the meer length of tedious journies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praiseworthy, as for the huge bulk. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a spirit as Alexanders, and working no less exquisitely, though the effects were less material, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would find the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must look upon such as Epaminondas, that encountring worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singular vertue over-topped their valiant enemies, and still prevailed over those, that would not have yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are, do seldom live to obtain great Empires. For it is a work of more labour and longer time, to master the equal forces of one hardy and well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly subdue a multitude of servile Nations, compounding the body of a gross unweildy Empire. Wherefore these Parvo-Potentes, men that with little have done much upon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choice examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactness and greatness concurring so seldom, that I can find no instance of both in one, save only that brave Roman, Cæsar.

Having thus far digressed, it is now time that we return unto our Eastern Conquerour; who is travailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch unto Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recovered in this first battel; upon which, by certain inscriptions, he made them partakers of his Victory. Herein he well advised himself; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gains in the Wars, as he doth of the spoils, shall never be long followed of those of the better sort. For men which are either well-born, or well-bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, do as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, do with the gain of gold and silver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexanders coming on, left some Companies to keep the Streights, which were indeed very defensible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, he began over-late to prise and put in execution the Counsel of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Wars advised him to waste all the provisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, and alwayes to give ground to the Invader, till he found some such notable advantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of Victory. For the fury of an invading Army

Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. These and the like sudden alterations bring many diseases upon all Nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleep, and, refusing to give or take battel, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have saved his own life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest incouragements given by Alexander, to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatal battel, That they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greeks, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdom. Pericles though the Lacedæmonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawn to hazard a battel: for the invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Because we read Histories to inform our understanding by the examples therein found, we will give some instances of those that have perished by adventuring in their own Countries, to charge an invading Army. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their destruction.

Pompey was well advised for a while, when he gave Cæsar ground; but when by the importunity of his Captains he adventured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battel, lost the freedom of Rome, and his own life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battel with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsels which promise surety in all things, are honorable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he invaded Provence, by wasting the Country, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alva weary the French in Naples, and dissolve the boistrous Army of the Prince of Orange in the Low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their General, would needs fight a battel with the Bourgonians, invading their Country, and could not be perswaded to linger the time, and stay their advantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand upon the place. Philip of Valois set upon King Edward at Cressie; and King John (when the English were well-neer tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit have been wasted to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great fury, neer Poitiers, to joyn battel with him: But all men know what lamentable success these two French Kings found. Charles the fifth of France made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blows, and followed his advice, which told him, That the English could never get his inheritance by smoak. And it is reported by Belloy and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchy of Guyen without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-lived, and the charge of things is committed unto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound advice. The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason have brought the Macedonians to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shameful to return, or dangerous to proceed. For, had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia been wasted whilst Alexander was far off; and the Streights of Cilicia been defended by Arsenes, Governor of that Province, with the best of his forces; hunger would not have suffered the enemy, to stay the trial of all means that might be thought upon, of forcing that passage: or if the place could not have been maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure have been so throughly spoiled, that the heart of his Army should have been broken, by seeking out miseries by painful travel.

But Arsenes leaving a small number to defend the Streights, took the best of his Army with him, to waste and spoil the Country; or rather, as may seem, to find himself some work, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather have adventured his person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps have saved the Province; and in the mean time, all that was in the fields, would have been conveighed into strong Towns. So should his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himself with his horsemen have had the less work in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders coming; and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all forms of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arsenes made all haste to joyn himself with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumspect, and to think that surely their General, who gave as lost the Country behind their backs, had exposed themselves unto certain death, as men that were good for nothing else but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore not affecting to dye for their Prince and Country (which honour they saw that Arsenes himself could well forbear) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their General, gleaning after his Harvest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardize of his Enemies, and the whole Province that had been alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IV.

Of the unwarlike Army levied by Darius against Alexander. The unadvised courses which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife and Children are made prisoners: of some things following the battel of Issus.

IN the mean season Darius approached, who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thousand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Justine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch, at six hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a Masker than a man of War, and like one that took more care to set out his glory and riches, than to provide for his own safety, perswading himself, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pomp and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Army there was carried the holy Fire, which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests; and after them three hundred and threescore and five young men, answering the number of the days of the year, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawn with white Horses, with their Riders cloathed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; and after it, the Horse of the Sun: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-layed and garnisht with silver and gold; and then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelve several Nations, which the better to avoid confusion, did hardly understand each others language; and these marshall'd in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitly to disorder all that followed them: in the tail of these Horses the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called Immortal, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chains of gold, and their coats with the same metal imbroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearl: baits, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withal, or to perswade them that it were great incivility to cut, and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said, Sumptuosè indutus miles, se virtute superiorem aliis non existimet, cum in præliis oporteat fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man think that he exceedeth those in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparel they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this advice was borrowed, who, when he fought against the Samnites in that fatal battel, wherein they all sware either to prevail or dye, thirty thousand of them having apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests, and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all fear: Non enim cristas vulnera facere, & per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteen thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breed the more terror) and these were honored with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Then came Darius himself, the Gentlemen of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serve, but they served their turns of these, by changing their massie-bodies into thin, portable and currant coyn. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open-winged Eagle of the same metal: The hinder part being raised high whereon Darius sate, had a covering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horsemen, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian blood, for fear of marring their beauty.

beauty. He had for the proper Guard of his own perſon, two hundred of the blood Royal; blood, too Royal and precious to be ſpilt by any valorous adventure (I am of opinion that two hundred ſturdy fellows, like the Switzers, would have done him more ſervice) and theſe were backt with thirty thouſand foot-men, after whom again were led four hundred ſpare horſes for the King, which if he had meant to have uſed, he would have marſhalled ſomewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Reer-ward, the ſame being led by Siſygambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great train of Ladies their attendants on horſe-back, with fifteen Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fifty Concubines, and a world of Nurſes and Eunuchs, moſt ſumptuouſly apparalled. By which it ſhould ſeem that Darius thought that the Macedonians had been Comedians or Tumblers; for this troop was far fitter to behold thoſe ſports than to be preſent at battels. Between theſe and a company of light-armed ſlaves, with a world of Varlets, was the Kings treaſure, charged on ſix hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this ſort came the May-game-King into the field, incumbred with a moſt unneceſſary train of Strumpets, attended with troops of divers Nations, ſpeaking divers languages, and for their numbers impoſſible to be marſhalled; and for the moſt part ſo effeminate, and ſo rich in gold and in garments, as the ſame could not but have encouraged the naked'ſt Nation of the world againſt them. We find it in daily experience, that all diſcourſe of Magnanimity, of National Virtue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatſoever elſe hath been wont to move and encourage Virtuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in compariſon of ſpoil and riches. The rich ſhips are boorded upon all diſadvantage, the rich Towns are furiouſly aſſaulted, and the plentiful Countries willingly invaded. Our Engliſh Nation have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards headlong, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Piſtolets; which, had they been put to it upon the like diſadvantages in Ireland, or in any poor Country, they would have turned their Pieces and Pikes againſt their Commanders, conteſting that they had been brought without reaſon to the butchery and ſlaughter. It is true that the War is made willingly, and for the moſt part with good ſucceſs, that is ordained againſt the richeſt Nations; for as the needy are always adventurous, ſo plenty is wont to ſhun peril, and men that have well to live, do rather ſtudy how to live well, I mean wealthily, than care to dye (as they call it) honourable. Car où il n'y a rien a gaigner que des coups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes haſte to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blows.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his conſultation with his Sooth-ſayers, he would have ſatisfied himſelf by the outſides of the Perſians, and never have looked into the intrails of Beaſts for ſucceſs. For leaving the deſcription of this ſecond battel (which is indeed no where well deſcribed; neither, for the confuſion and haſty running away of the Aſians, could it be) we have enough by the ſlaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to inform us what manner of reſiſtance was made. For if it be true that three-ſcore thouſand Perſian footmen were ſlain in this battel, with ten thouſand of their horſemen; Or (as Curtius ſaith) an hundred thouſand footmen, with the ſame number of horſemen, and beſides this ſlaughter, 40000 taken priſoners, while of Alexanders Army there miſcarried but two hundred and four-ſcore of all ſorts, of which numbers Arrianus and other Hiſtorians cut off almoſt the one half; I do verily believe, that this ſmall number rather died with the over-travel and pains-taking in killing their enemies, than by any ſtrokes received from them. And ſurely if the Perſian Nation (at this time degenerate and the baſeſt of the World) had had any ſavour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers, they would never have ſold ſo good cheap, and at ſo vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their own honour been valued by them at nothing, and the Kings ſafety and his eſtate at leſs. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a baniſhed Græcian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had aſſembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in paſſing by they would devour, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to aſſail; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattelled in groſs ſquadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furniſhed with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make ſo little accompt of his delicate Persians, loving their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed, and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (having so great abundance of treasure to do it withal) a sufficient number of the same Grecians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equal courage, he would repent him overlate, as taught by the miserable success like to follow.

But this discourse was so unpleasing to Darius (who had been accustomed to nothing so much as to his own praises, and to nothing so little as to hear truth) as he commanded that this poor Grecian should be presently slain: who while he was a sundring in the Tormentors hand, used this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom he had given this good counsel, should assuredly revenge his death, and lay deserved punishment upon Darius for despising his advice.

It was the saying of a Wise man: Desperata ejus, Principis salus est, cujus aures ita formatæ sunt, ut aspera quæ utilia, nec quicquam nisi jucundum accipiat; That Princes safety is in a desperate case, whose ears judge all that is profitable to be too sharp, and will entertain nothing that is unpleasant.

For, liberty in Council is the life and essence of Council; Libertas consilii est ejus, vita, & essentia, qua erepta consilium evanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the advice given him by the Grecian Souldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they been Counsellers and Directors in that War, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the help of a good troop of horsemen been able to have opposed the fury of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot men. For when Darius was overthrown with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Grecians, under their Captain Amyntas, held firm, and marched away in order, in despight of the Vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we read in Histories ancient and modern, what brave retraits have been made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they have served, hath been broken.

At the battel of Ravenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroken and undismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Neumours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the Victory not entire by their escape, he was overturned and slain in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers, fear them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminentis mali, opus ipsum, quantumvis difficile, aggrediuntur; They go about the business it self, how hard soever it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischief hanging over their heads may bring: and as truly of those that know the Wars but by hear-say; Quod valentes sunt & prævalentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They have ability enough, and to spare, till dangers appear; but when peril indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Grecians also that made the retrait, advised Darius to retire his Army into the plain of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champians, he might have invironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withal they counselled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battels, and have brought no greater number at once than might have been well marshalled and conducted. But this Counsel was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inviron the Grecians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traytors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not work always by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdoms and Estates, by taking understanding from the Governours, so as they can neither give nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander upon a streightned piece of ground, neer unto the City of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could (who by the advice of Parmenio stayed there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrown, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecian his followers had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elswhere) taken prisoners, and all their train of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queen, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due unto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored unto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautiful Lady, and his Daughters of excellent form, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, non, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captivity; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to six thousand and two hundred talents of coyn, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himself leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chief Captains, (casting the Crown from his head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phœnicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governor.

Aradus, Zidon and Biblos, Maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast, that it trod on his heels; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the less, overthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly levied; the Lacedæmonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; four thousand of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battel, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdoms.

Alexander to honor Ephestion, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poor estate, that laboured to sustain his life being of the Royal blood, was commended by the people unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same hour.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could bear his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietness of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not perform in himself that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a sign that he did but accompany, and could not Govern his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts; he received a letter from Darius, importing the ransome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornful answer upon the offer of peace, than they did before the tryal of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leaf; the one a resolved, well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdained the offers of Darius, and sent him word, that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himself.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and wan the City of Tire.

Alexander coming near the City of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crown, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he took very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a Sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their City, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his company within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adjoyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea between the Island and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea upon a storm of wind, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torn asunder; yet with the help of his Navy which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seven months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great lois of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those that escaped the fury, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for slaves (saith Diodore) thirteen thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many Arrian. more more had died, had not the Zidonians, that ſerved Alexander, conveyed great numbers away by ſhipping unto their own City.

Juſt. l. 18. Happy it was for Apollo that the Town was taken: for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that this god meant to forſake the City, they bound him faſt with a golden chain to the Idol of Hercules; but Alexander, like a gracious Prince, looſed him again.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprize, and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nebuchodonnoſor had taken it before, and filled up the chanel that lay between the Iſland and the Main.

The Government of this Territory he gave to Philotas the Son of Parmenio; Cicilia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenio; Epheſtion had charge of the Fleet, and was directed to find Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered Conditions of Peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza, and deals graciouſly with the Jews.

IN the mean while Darius ſends again to Alexander, ſets before him all the difficulties of paſſing on towards the Eaſt, and layeth the loſs of the laſt Battel to the ſtreightneſs of the place: he hoped to terrifie him by threatning to encompaſs him in the plain Countries, he bids him to conſider, how impoſſible it was to paſs the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the reſt, with all ſuch other fearful things: for he that was now filled with nothing but fear, had arguments enow of that nature to preſent unto another. All the Kingdoms between the River of Alys, and the Helleſpont, he offered him in Dower with his beloved Daughter. But Alexander anſwered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which victory and his own virtue had poſſeſt him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, and that he having paſſed the Sea it ſelf, diſdained to think of reſiſtance in tranſporting himſelf over Rivers. It is ſaid, That Parmenio, who was now old, and full of honour and riches, told the King, That were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander anſwered, That ſo would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and coming before Gaza, Getis, a faithful ſervant to Darius, ſhuts the Gate againſt him, and defends the Town with an obſtinate reſolution, at the ſiege whereof Alexander received a wound in the ſhoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his leg with a ſtone. He found better men in this place than he did at the former Battels; for he left ſo many of his Macedonians buried in the Sands of Gaza, that he was forced to ſend for a new ſupply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander firſt began to change condition, and to exerciſe cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by aſſault, and taken Betis (whom Joſephus calleth Babemeſis) that was weakned with many wounds, and who never gave ground to the Aſſailants; he bored holes thorow his feet, and cauſed him to be drawn about the ſtreet, whilſt he was as yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himſelf, diſdained to ask him either life or remiſſion of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his tyranny, but the imitation of his Anceſtor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true; that cruelty hath always ſomewhat to cover her deformity.

From Gaza (ſaith Joſephus) he led his Army towards Jeruſalem, a City, for the antiquity and great fame thereof, well known unto him while he lay before Tyre; He had ſent for ſome ſupply thither, which Jaddus the High-Prieſt, being ſubject and ſworn to Darius, had refuſed him. The Jews therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to reſiſt, committed the care of their eſtates and ſafety to Jaddus, who, being taught by God, iſſued out of the City covered with his Pontifical Robes, to wit, an upper garment of Purple, embroidered with gold, with his Mitre, and the plate of gold wherein the Name of God was written, the Prieſts and Levites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner ſo unuſual, ſtately, and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Joſephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the High-Prieſt, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. Howſoever it was, I am of opinion, that he became ſo confident in his enterprize, and ſo aſſured of the ſucceſs after the Prophecy of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he ſaw himſelf, and the Conqueſt of Perſia ſo directly pointed at, as nothing thenceforth could diſcourage him, or fear him. He confeſſed to Parmenio (ſaith Joſephus) that in Dio a City of Macedon, when his mind laboured the Conqueſt of Aſia, he ſaw in his ſleep ſuch a perſon as Jaddus, and ſo apparelled, profeſſing one and the ſame God; by whom he was encouraged to purſue the purpoſe he had in hand, with aſſurance of victory. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantaſie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was ſo exceedingly pleaſed and emboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phœnicians (who hoped to have ſacked and deſtroyed Jeruſalem) he gave the Jews all, and more than they deſired, both of liberty and immunity, with permiſſion to live under their own Laws, and to exerciſe and enjoy their own Religion.

Alexander wins Egypt: and makes a journey to the Temple of Hammon.

FRom Jeruſalem, Alexander turned again towards Egypt, and entred it; where Darius his Lieutenant, Aſtaces, received him, and delivered into his hand the City of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treaſure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we ſee, that the King of Perſia, who had more of affection than of judgement, gave to the valianteſt man he had, but the command of one City, and to the veryeſt coward the government of all Egypt. When he had ſet things in order in Egypt, he began to travel after God-head, towards Jupiter Hammon; ſo fooliſh had proſperity made him. He was to paſs over the dangerous and dry Sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels back was ſpent, he could not but have periſhed, had not a marvellous ſhowr of rain fallen upon him, when his Army was in extreme deſpair. All men that know Egypt, and have written thereof, affirm, That it never rains there: but the purpoſes of the Almighty God are ſecret, and he bringeth to paſs what it pleaſeth him; for it is alſo ſaid, That when he had loſt his way in thoſe vaſt deſarts, that a flight of Crows flew before the Army; who making faſter wing when they were followed, and fluttering ſlowly when the Army was caſt back, guided them over thoſe pathleſs Sands to Jupiters Temple.

Arrianus, from the report of Ptolomy, the Son of Lagus, ſays, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be alike true. But many of thoſe wonders and prodigious things, are fained by thoſe that have written the Story of Alexander; as, That an Eagle lay hovering directly over his head at the battel of Iſſus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he ſlept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnaſſæus, fore-ſhewing the treaſon of Æropus, practiſed by Darius to have ſlain him; That from the Iron bars of which the Tyrians made their defenſive Engines, when Alexander beſieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loaf of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the ſame time; That a Turf of earth fell on his ſhoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the Air. The Spaniards in the Conqueſt of the Weſt Indies have many ſuch pretty tales; telling how they have been aſſiſted in battel by the preſence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horſes, with the like Romiſh miracles, which I think themſelves do hardly believe. The ſtrangeſt thing that I have read of in this kind, being certainly true, was, That the night before the battel at Novara, all the Dogs which followed the French Army, ran from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and fed by them all their lives, and in the morning following, Trivulzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by theſe imperial Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idol of Jupiter Hammon is ill deſcribed by Curtius: for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom and the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the ſuperior Egypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, and the River of Nilus, are interjacent; and on the North he joyns it to a Nation called Naſſamones, who bordering the Sea-ſhore, live (ſaith he) upon the ſpoils of ſhip-wrack: whereas the Temple or Grove of this Idol hath no Sea near it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; theſe Naſſamones being due Weſt from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came near the place, he ſent ſome of his Paraſites before him to practiſe the Prieſts attending the Oracle, That their anſwer might be given in all things, agreeable to his mad ambition; who affected the title of Jupiter's Son. And ſo he was ſaluted, Son of Jupiter, by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as ſome think) defective in the Greek Tongue; For whereas he meant to ſay, O padion, he ſaid, O pai dios; that is, O Son of Jupiter, inſtead of O dear Son: for which Grammatical errour he was richly rewarded, and a rumour preſently ſpread, that the Great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his own.

He had heard that Perſeus and Hercules had formerly conſulted with this Oracle, The one when he was employed againſt Gorgon; The other againſt Antæus and Buſiris; and ſeeing theſe men had derived themſelves from the gods, Why might not he?

By

By this it seems, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fools, though indeed he made himself one, by thinking to cover from the worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirm his followers in the belief of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honor Alexander as his Son.

Curt. l. 4. Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bos carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams head, I see that many wise men have troubled themselves to find out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Doinysius or Liber Pater (who lived, saith S. Augustine, in Moses time) Ea quæ de diis veteres fabulis suis conscripsere, non sunt nimium curiose pervestiganda; We must not over-curiously search into the fables which the Ancients have written of their gods.

But this is certain and notable, that after the Gospel began to be preached in the World, the Devil, in this, and all other Idols, became speechless. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witness.

There is found near his Temple a Fountain called Fons solis (though Ptolomy in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at Mid-night is as hot as boiling water, and at Noon as cold as any Ice: to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

FRom the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where, among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Psammones, who, belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiters Son, told him that God was the Father King of all men in general; and reining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortal men, but that he acknowledged none for his children, save good men.

He gave the charge of the several Provinces of Egypt to several Governors, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperors also followed, not daring to commit the Government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Westermost branch of Nilus. And having now setled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phœnicia, and Syria (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily have redeemed) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage, though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a River for the swiftness thereof called by the Persians, The Arrow. Curt. l. 4. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it self tells us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the stream was such, as it drave before it many weighty stones, and those that moved not, but lay in the bottom, were so round and well polished by a continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian footmen to wade the River, otherwise than by joyning their hands, and enterlacing arms together, making one weighty and entire body to resist the swift passage, and furious race of the stream. Besides this notable help, the Chanel was so deep towards the Eastern shore, where Darius should have made head, as the footmen were enforced to lift their Bows, and Arrows, and Darts, over their heads to keep them from being moistened, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truly and understandingly said of Homer, Arist. Pol. lib. 5.

Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq;
(Deorumq;

The minds of men are ever so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of misgovernment have been subject to many grievous, and sometimes mortal diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it self into a burning and consuming Feaver, and thereby become frantick, and without understanding, fore-shewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tygris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place;

place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the Paſſage both of Euphrates and it) preſented himſelf to the Macedonians, followed with certain companies of Horſemen, as if with uneven forces he durſt have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude far exceeding them, he forſook the advantage which no valour of his enemies could eaſily have overcome. But it is commonly ſeen, that fearfull and cowardly men do ever follow thoſe wayes and counſels, whereof the opportunity is already loſt.

It is true, that he ſet all proviſions afire, wherewith the Macedonians might ſerve themſelves over Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to have diſtreſſed them; but the execution of good counſel is fruitleſs, when unſeaſonable. For now was Alexander ſo well furniſhed with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Thoſe things alſo which he ſought to waſte, Alexander being now in ſight, were by his Horſe-men ſaved and recovered. This Mazeus might have done ſome dayes before at good leiſure; or at this time with ſo great a ſtrength of horſemen, as the Macedonians durſt not have purſued them, leaving the ſtrength of their foot out of ſight, and far behind.

The new Proviſions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the Battel of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexanders firſt return out of Egypt, had aſſembled all the forces, which thoſe Regions next him could furniſh, and now alſo were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (ſaith Curtius) that rather ſerved to make up the names of men, than to make reſiſtance. Arrianus hath numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all ſorts ten hundred thouſand, and of horſe four hundred thouſand, beſides armed Chariots, and ſome few Elephants. Curtius, who muſters the Army of Darius at two hundred thouſand foot, and near fifty thouſand Horſe, comes (I think) nearer to the true number; and yet ſeeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vaſſals, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all ſorts ſome three or four hundred thouſand, with which he hoped in thoſe fair plains of Aſſyria, to have overborn the few numbers of the invading Army. But it is a Rule in the Philoſophy of the War;

In omni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium ſolent præſtare victoriam; In every Battel skill and practice do more towards the Victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave reſt to his Army after the paſſage over Tygris, there happened an Eclipſe of the Moon, of which the Macedonians not knowing the cauſe and reaſon, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwayes are) took it for a certain preſage of their overthrow and deſtruction, inſomuch as they began not only to murmure, but to ſpeak it boldly; That for the ambition of one man, a man that diſdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Jupiter, they ſhould all periſh; for he not only enforced them to make War againſt worlds of enemies, but againſt Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themſelves.

Hereupon, Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, and to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Aſtrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be aſſured that this defection of the Moon was a certain preſage of good ſucceſs; for, that it was natural, they never imparted to the common people, but reſerved the knowledge to themſelves, ſo as a ſorry Almanack-maker had been no ſmall fool in thoſe dayes.

Of this kind of ſuperſtitious obſervation Cæſar made good uſe, when he fought againſt Arioviſtus and the Germans: for they being perſwaded by the caſting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moon, they ſhould certainly loſe the Battel, Cæſar forced them to abide it, though they durſt not give it; wherein, having their minds already beaten by their own ſuperſtition, and being reſolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect periſhed.

Theſe Egyptians gave no other reaſon than this, That the Grecians were under the aſpect of the Sun, the Perſians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being darkened, the ſtate of Perſia was now in danger of failing, and their glory of being obſcured. This judgement of the Egyptian Prieſts being noiſed through all the Army, all were ſatisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the War, which, though deviſed ſince, was well obſerved then: Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captain lead his Army to the fight when it is poſſeſſed with matter of terrour.

It is truly obſerved by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, we find it in all stories, and often in our own, that by such inventions, devised tales, dreams, and Prophecies, the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their own loss and ruine.

As Alexander drew near the Persian Army, certain Letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Gracians, perswading them for great summs of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these, by the advice of Parmenio, he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his fair Wife, oppresst with sorrow, and wearied with travel, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no less to bewail than Darius, who upon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her; but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his own that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferr it on so just and continent an enemy as Alexander; to whom he once again, before the last tryal by Battel, offered these conditions of Peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliver up, and resign all Asia the less; and, with Egypt, all those Kingdoms between the Phœnician Sea, and the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the Ransome of his Mother, and his other Daughters, thirty thousand Talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his Son Ochus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadours to be removed, advised with his Council, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these fair conditions. He told him, That the Empire between Euphrates and Hellespont, was a fair addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian Prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of far better use than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable, that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for virtue, as for Fortune, and left himself a Successour of able age to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward indeed he much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himself: who, to assure themselves of what they had usurped upon his Issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so far into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised, and gratefull: and being taught new Lessons by abundance of prosperity, became a lover of wine, of his own flattery, and of extreme cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of one unjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts, and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadours stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his own natural clemency and magnanimity, without any respect to their Master; but thanks to an enemy was improper: that he made no Wars against adversity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summs of money to perswade his friends to attempt upon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant; yet he could not (were it otherwise and faithfull) resolve in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made War against him, not as a King with Royal and overt-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back again over Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then believe that he offered him somewhat in his own power: Otherwise he propounded to himself for the reward of the War which he had made, all those Kingdoms as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether he were abused by his own hopes or no, the Battel which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion he told them, that he came into Asia to give, and not to receive; That the Heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius would be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The Battel of Arbela: and that it could not be ſo ſtrongly fought as report hath made it.

WIth this Anſwer the Embaſſadors return; Darius prepares to fight, and ſends Mazeus to defend a paſſage, which he never dared yet ſo much as to hazard. Alexander conſults with his Captains. Parmenio perſwades him to force Darius his Camp by night; ſo that the multitude of enemies might not move terrour in the Macedonians being but few. Alexander diſdains to ſteal the Victory, and reſolves to bring with him the day-light, to witneſs his valour. But it was the ſucceſs that made good Alexander's reſolution, though the counſel given by Parmenio was more ſound: For it is a ground in War, Si pauci neceſſariò cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, conſilium eſt noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithſtanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he ſtaggers and trenches himſelf upon a ground of advantage, which the Perſian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for fear of ſurprize had ſtood with his Army in Armour all the day, and forborn ſleep all the night, Alexander gave his men reſt and ſtore of food; for reaſon had taught him this Rule in the War, In pugna Milites validiùs reſiſtunt, ſi cibo potuque refecti fuerint; nam fames intrinſecus magis pugnat, quàm ferrum exteriùs: Souldiers do the better ſtand to it in fight, if they have their bellies full of meat and drink; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than ſteel without.

The numbers which Alexander had, ſaith Arrianus, were forty thouſand foot, and ſeven thouſand horſe; theſe belike were of the Europæan Army: for he had beſides, both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of thoſe Regions. He uſed but a ſhort ſpeech to his Souldiers to encourage them. And I think that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former Battels upon the River of Granick, and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were beſt taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true ſaying, Victoria victoriam parat, animumque victoribus auget, & adverſariis aufert; One victory begets another, and puts courage into thoſe that have already had the better, taking ſpirit away from thoſe that have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large deſcriptions of this Battel, fought at Gaugamela; They tell us of many charges and re-charges; That the Victory inclined ſometime to the Perſians, ſometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being overthrown, who led the left wing; That Alexander's Rere-guard was broken, and his carriages loſt; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both ſides, Fortune her ſelf was long unreſolved on whom to beſtow the Garland: And laſtly, that Alexander in perſon wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But in concluſion, Curtius delivers us in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible dayes work, ſaying, That Epheſtion, Perdiccas, and others of name were wounded. Arrianus finds not a third part of this number ſlain; of the Perſians there fell forty thouſand (ſaith Curtius) thirty thouſand, according to Arrianus; ninety thouſand, if we believe Diodore. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former Battels, the Perſians upon the firſt charge ran away, and that the Macedonians purſued; For if of thoſe four or five hundred thouſand Aſians brought into the field by Darius, every man had caſt but a dart or a ſtone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the Eaſt at ſo eaſie a rate, as ſix or ſeven hundred men in three notorious Battels. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, and had armed but fifty or threeſcore thouſand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the moſt of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impoſſible for Alexander to have paſt that River ſo eaſily, much leſs the River of Tigris. But as a man whoſe Empire God in his Providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and ſuffered Alexander to enter ſo far into the bowels of his Kingdom, as all hope and poſſibility of eſcape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had preſented unto them the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way conſtrain his own, ſeeing they had many large Regions to run into from thoſe that invaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the Battel of Arbela. The yielding of Babylon and Suſa.

DArius, after the rout of his Army, recovered Arbela the ſame night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ran after him, his purpoſe of making a retrait into Media, perſwading them that the Macedonians, greedy of ſpoyl and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great mass of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the fear which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had been twice beaten, should rather have sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so near the place where he abid the coming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leisure; but being overcome, he knew it unpossible to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing enemy, seeing himself, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, cast the Crown from his head, to run away with the more speed. But errours are then best discerned when most incurable; Et præterita magis reprehendi possunt quàm corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus, in whom Darius had most confidence, rendred himself, his Children, and the City. Also the Captain of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowers, burnt Frankincense upon Altars of silver, as Alexander passed by, and delivered unto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldæan Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnity to entertain their new King: after these came the Babylonian horse-men, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poor in warlike furniture. Between these (though not greatly to be feared) and himself, Alexander caused his Macedonian foot-men to march. When he entred the Castle, he admired the glory thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fifty thousand Talents of silver uncoyned. The City itself I have elsewhere described, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderful place of pleasure about two miles in Circuit, surrounded with a wall of fourscore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-born with Pillars) a Grove of beautifull and fruitfull Trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queen and other Princesses might walk privately therein. In this City, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himself and the whole Army four and thirty dayes, consuming that time in banquetting, and in all sorts of effeminate exercise; which so much softned the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of War, which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painful travel, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certain selected Judges to have deserved best in the late War. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Marshall Monluct) that the title and charge of a Captain hath been bestowed on every Picque-Bœauf, or Spurn-Cow; for when the Captains of foot had a thousand Souldiers under one Ensign, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honourable, and the Kings were less charged, and far better served. King Henry the eighth of England never gave the Command of any of his good Ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate; nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of quality Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe; for Antipater sent him six thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; and out of Greece four thousand and four hundred horse, by which his Army was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought again, De quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and City of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his own Captains, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Appolidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand Talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the City unto him, he gave him the title of his Lieutenant over all, and took with him Bagistines that gave up the Castle; and having distributed to every Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on toward Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolomy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the River Euleus, a City sometime governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, Governour of this famous City, gave it up to the Conquerour, with fifty thousand talents of silver in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the War, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort, did those Vassals of fortune, lovers of the Kings prosperity, not of his person, (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their own peace and safety with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that whatsoever titles he gave to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his own Captains, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battel, all the Nobility of Persia would have returned unto their natural Lord. Those that are Traitors to their own Kings, are never to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertain them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any frontier-Town, or Fortress of weight, by the rendring whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Navarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted, with Fonterabe, in the year 1523.

on

Diodor. speaketh of more than forty thousand talents in bullion, and of nine millions of gold, sub Dorica forma excusi.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furnish'd the King from Babylon; and while he stayed four and thirty dayes at Babylon, Abulites might have holpen him from Susa; and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieved him; for the great mass of Treasure was laid up in that City. But who hath sought out and friended fearful adversity? It is certain, that benefits bind not the ambitious, but the honest? for those that are but greedy of themselves, do in all changes of fortune only consult the conservation of their own greatness.

The Government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites, who rendred it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giving them titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said that Charles the fifth, having promised Charles of Bourbon the Government of Marseilles, if he could have forc'd it, and whereof he made sure accompt, told some of his neareſt Counsellors, that he meant nothing less than the performance of that promise, because he should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour.

How Alexander came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

FRom Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to pass those Mountains which sunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Streights, called Pylæ Persidis, or Susæidæ, and after the loss of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc'd to save himself by retrait, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain-top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforc'd to fight upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis; but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, wherein he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515, find a way over the Alpes, the Switzers undertaking to defend all the passages, who if their footmanship had not saved them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill payd for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greeks, saith Curtius (Justine numbers them but at eight hundred) having been taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their hands, noses, ears, and other members, as they could no way have been known to their Countrey-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crowns, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandees, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoyl the Kings treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexanders arrival, and they that stayed followed the worst Counsel; for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to spoil and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had been laid in the ballance with Persepolis, would have weighed it down. Babylon indeed, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulk and main store of the Persians. For after the spoyl that had been made of money, curious Plate, Bullion, Images of Gold and Silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himself one hundred and twenty thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formal honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his own. The body of his Army he left here for thirty dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand Horse, and certain troops of chosen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered; a fruitless and foolish enterprise, but, as Seneca sayes; Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare: He hath not a will to go, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him, because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsook his Horse, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himself can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwise take off their wearines that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drink, did quench their thirst, that could less endure it. For mine own little judgement, I shall rather commend that Captain that makes careful provision for those that follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extreme necessity, than those witless arrogant fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admiral of France; That who so will shape that Beast (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians that were most amorous of his vertues, complain, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drink; That he smothered in carowsing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his own and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and City of Persepolis to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, and thereby alien their hearts; for they might well believe that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing less than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Post vinolentiam crudelitas sequitur; Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkenness: For it so fell out soon after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

ABout this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to find Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbred at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his fortune. He therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds unto them his resolution, who being desperate of good success, used silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of War, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the ice, and protesting that he could never be beaten by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firm confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Nabarzanes and Bessus, whereof the later was Governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master; and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the War, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themſelves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes uſed, and in concluſion adviſed the election of his fellow Traytor Beſſus, with promiſe that, the Wars ended, the Empire ſhould again be reſtored to Darius. The King ſwollen with diſdain, preſt towards Naburzanes to have ſlain him, but Beſſus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the reſt, with-held him. In the mean while Naburzanes with-drew himſelf, and Beſſus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the reſt of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull ſervant, perſwaded him to be adviſed and ſerve the time, ſeeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at leaſt make ſhew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle diſpoſition, willingly yielded unto. Beſſus makes his ſubmiſſion, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thouſand Greeks, which had in all the former battels ſerved Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retrait in ſpight of the Macedonians, offered himſelf to guard his perſon, proteſting againſt the Treaſon of Beſſus; but it was not his deſtiny to follow their advice who from the begining of the War gave him faithful counſel, but he inclined ſtill to Beſſus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patron their Captain, were corrupted by Alexander, and practiſed the diviſion of his faithful ſervants. Beſſus had drawn unto him thirty thouſand of the Army, promiſing them all thoſe things, by which the lovers of the World and themſelves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, ſafety, and honour.

Now the day following, Darius plainly diſcovered the purpoſes of Beſſus, and being overcome with paſſion, as thinking himſelf unable to make head againſt theſe ungrateful and unnatural Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull ſervant to depart from him, and to provide for himſelf. In like ſort he diſcharged the reſt of his attendants, all ſave a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Perſians being moſt baſe cowards, durſt not undertake his defence againſt the Bactrians, notwithſtanding that they had four thouſand Greeks to joyn with him, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forſakes himſelf, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like, and King-like, to have dyed in the head of thoſe four thouſand Greeks, which offered him the diſpoſition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perſwaded him) than to have lyen bewailing himſelf on the ground, and ſuffering himſelf to be bound like a ſlave by thoſe ambitious Monſters that laid hand on him, whom neither the conſideration of his former great eſtate, nor the honour he had given them, nor the truſt repoſed in them, nor the world of benefits beſtowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his preſent adverſity, which above all things ſhould have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungratefull hearts. Vain it was indeed to hope it; for, Infidelity hath no compaſſion.

Now Darius, thus forſaken, was bound and laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beaſts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be diſcovered; and, to add deſpight and deriſion to his adverſity, they faſtned him with Chains of Gold, and ſo drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Beſſus and Naburzanes perſwaded themſelves to redeem their lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a priſoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themſelves Kings by his ſlaughter; and then to defend themſelves by force of Arms. But they failed in both. For it is againſt the nature of God, who is moſt juſt, to pardon ſo ſtrange villany, yea, though againſt a Prince purely Heatheniſh and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durſt not abide his coming, haſtened after him with a violent ſpeed, and becauſe he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on horſe-back certain ſelected companies of them, and beſt armed, and with ſix thouſand other Horſe, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treaſon of Beſſus, and ſecretly forſook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Beſſus took, and how near he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being diſcovered by Beſſus his Rear, Beſſus brought a Horſe to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perſwading him to mount thereon, and to ſave himſelf. But the unfortunate King refuſing to follow thoſe that had betrayed him, they caſt Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beaſts that drew him, and ſlew two poor Servants that attended his perſon. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the reſt to the mercy of the Macedonian ſwords.

Polyſtratus a Macedonian, being by purſuit of the vanquiſhed preſt with thirſt, as he was was refreshing himself with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Team of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to move, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his own blood: And by a Persian Captive which followed this Polystratus, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Tragedy. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrows unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traytors, which had dealt no less unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his own honour, and for the safety of all that did, or should after wear Crowns. He also having nothing else to present, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace used towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal Gods to submit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient Death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wherewith to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

§. XIV.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travels were near an end, every man preparing for his return. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved, for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundless Ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength, was, that Bessus, a most cruel Traytor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hyrcanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return) make himself Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former travels. In conclusion he wan their consents to go on: which done, leaving Craterus with certain Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with six thousand horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certain passages for a while. He passeth the River of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolves it self in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia and Hyrcania, where hiding it self under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth again, and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta, or Zendracarta, the same City which Ptolomy writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen dayes, banquetting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and Governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greeks, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end, they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedæmonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having slain himself. He was also wrought (though to his great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris Queen of the Amazons; where, by way of digression, it is shewed, that such Amazons have been and are.

HEre it is said, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queen of the Amazons, came to visit him, and her sute was, (which she easily obtained) that she might accompany him till she were made with childe by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her own Country.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But indeed, the letters of Alexander himself to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian business, may justly breed suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vain tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his books to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage, was laught at by the King for inserting such news of the Amazons; and Lysimachus himself had never heard heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, took upon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought ſingle with an Elephant, and ſlain it. The King hearing ſuch ſtuff, caught the book, and threw it into the river of Indus; ſaying, That it were well done to throw the Writer after it, who by inſerting ſuch fables, diſparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we believe and know that there are Elephants, though it were falſe that Alexander fought with one; ſo may we give credit unto Writers making mention of ſuch Amazons, whether it were true or falſe that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digreſſion, as well to ſhew the opinions of the ancient Hiſtorians, Coſmographers, and others, as alſo of ſome modern diſcoverers touching theſe warlike Women, becauſe not only Strabo, but many others of theſe our times make doubt, whether or no there were any ſuch kind of people. Julius Solinus ſeats them in the North parts of Aſia the leſs. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one on the River Thermodoon, the other neer the Caſpian Sea; Quas (ſaith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatides. The former of theſe two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum eſt (ſaith Vadianus, who hath commented upon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuiſſe; It is certain that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy ſet them farther in to the Land North-wards, near the Mountains Hippaci, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Aſia it ſelf toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell us. Where they governed a people called the Pandeans or Padeans, ſo called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the reſt derive themſelves. Claudian affirms, That they commanded many Nations: For he ſpeaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (ſaith he) than thoſe which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea, neer Heraclium. Herodotus doth alſo make report of theſe Amazons, whom he tells us that the Scythians call Æorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or men-killers. And that they made incurſion into Aſia the leſs, ſackt Epheſus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon and Aventinus report; which they performed forty years after Troy was taken. At the ſiege of Troy it ſelf we read of Penthe-ſilea, that ſhe came to the ſuccour of Priamus.

Æniad. 1. l. 3.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cauſe of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermodoon, ſpeaking confidently of the wars they made with divers Nations, and of their overthrow.

L. 22. c. 7.

Plutarch in the life of Theſeus; out of Philochorus, Hellenicus and other ancient Hiſtorians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queen of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Theſeus; though ſome affirm, That Theſeus himſelf got her by ſtealth, when ſhe came to viſit him aboard his ſhip. But in ſubſtance there is little difference; all confeſſing, That ſuch Amazons there were. The ſame Author in the life of Pompey ſpeaks of certain companies of the Amazons, that came to aid the Albanians againſt the Romans, by whom after the battel, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up: and he ſaith farther, That theſe women entertain the Gelæ and Legales once a year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the navigation of Orellana, which he made down the river of Amazon from Peru in the year, 1542. (upon which river, for the divers turnings, he is ſaid to have ſailed ſix thouſand miles) reports from the relation of the ſaid Orellana, to the Council of the Indies, That he both ſaw thoſe women, and fought with them, where they ſought to impeach his paſſage towards the Eaſt-Sea.

Hiſt. Ind. par. 1. c. 28.

It is alſo reported by Ulrichus Schmidel, that in the year, 1542. when he ſailed up the Rivers of Paragua and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Country, called Scherves, inhabiting under the Tropick of Capricorn, who gave his Captain Ernando Rieffere, a Crown of ſilver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queen of the Amazons in thoſe parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his deſcription of the Kingdom of Congo, makes relation of ſuch Amazons, telling us, That (agreeably to the reports of elder times) they burn off their right breaſts, and live apart from men, ſave at one time of the year, when they feaſt and accompany them for one month. These (saith he) possess a part of the Kingdom of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperour, all the East-Indian Portugals know.

I have produced these authorities in part, to justifie mine own relation of these Amazons, because that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that these women still live and govern, was held for a vain and unprobable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxury: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOw as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his prosperity had so much over-wrought his virtue, as he accounted clemency to be but baseness, and the temperance which he had used all his life-time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becoming the instructers of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King as the World could not equal. For he perswaded himself, that he now represented the greatness of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him; he ware the robes and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobility should do the like: he entertained in his Court and Camp, the same shameless rabble of Curtisans, and Sodomitical Eunuchs, that Darius had done; and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and detested manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So lincentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he served (detesting the vices of the invaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himself, contrary to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soever it were, could not be but fearful unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foul and fearful Monster than Darius, from whose tyranny he vaunted to have delivered so many Nations. Yea, those that were deareſt and neereſt unto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornful discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many travels, more impoverished in their virtues, than inriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered, were the baser slaves. Neither were these opinions so reserved, but that the noise of them came to his ears. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose judgements he was most jealous; and making it known to the Army, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himself Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Army of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to go on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so far engaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoils of so many Cities, as the whole Army seemed but the guard of their carriages (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every mans fardels to be brought into the Maket-place, he, together with his own, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved most dangerous unto him, seeing the common Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painful travels, and with their blood, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, news came to him, that Satribarzanes, whom he had established in his former Government over the Arians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebel, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the advantage of a strong wind, won the passage over an high and unaccessable Rock, which was defended against him with thirteen thousand foot. For the extremity of the flame and smoak forced them from the place, otherwise invincible. I saw in the third civil War of France, certain Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high-Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certain bundles of straw, let down by an Iron chain, and a weighty stone in the midst, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendred themselves, with their plate, mony, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three years before my arrival in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Country-people, who who did ſet the long dry graſs on fire to the Eaſtward of them (the wind in thoſe parts being alwaies Eaſt) ſo as, notwithſtanding their flying from the ſmoak, there was not any one that eſcaped. Sir John Burrowes alſo, with a hundred Engliſh was in great danger of being loſt at Margarita, in the Weſt-Indies, by having the graſs fired behind him; but the ſmoak being timefully diſcovered, he recovered the Sea-ſhore with the loſs of ſixteen of his men. I remember theſe things; but to give caution to thoſe that ſhall in times to come invade any part of thoſe Countries, that they alwaies, before they paſs into the Land, burn down the graſs, and ſedge, to the Eaſt of them; they may otherwiſe, without any other enemy than a handful of ſtraw ſet on fire, dye the death of Hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hive.

§. XVII.

A Conſpiracy againſt Alexander; The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

ALexander was, after he parted hence, no where reſiſted, till he came into Aria, to the Eaſt of Bactria, where the chief City of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended againſt him, by the revolt of Satribarzanes; but in the end he received the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Army was re-enforced with a new ſupply of five thouſand and five hundred foot, and neer five hundred horſe, out of Greece, Theſſalie, and other places. His journey out of Perſia into theſe parts, is very confuſedly deſcribed. For, having (as all his Hiſtorians tell us) a determination to find Beſſus in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania; from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obſcure Mardi, upon the Caſpian-Sea, and thence over the Mountain Coronus into Aria and Dranginia.

At this time it was that the treaſon of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the Son of Parmenio was accuſed, as acceſſary, if not principal. This Dimnus, having (I know not upon what ground) conſpired with ſome others againſt the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the ſame treaſon. The Youth, although he was firſt bound by oath to ſecrecy, when he heard ſo foul a matter uttered, began to proteſt againſt it ſo vehemently, that his friend was like to have ſlain him for ſecurity of his own life. So, conſtrained by fear, he made ſhew as if he had been won by perſwaſion; and by ſeeming at length to like well of the buſineſs, he was told more at large what they were that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of rank, whoſe names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprize) reckoned up to Nichomachus. Nichomachus had no ſooner freed himſelf from the company of this Traytor Dimnus, than he acquainted his own Brother Ceballinus with the whole Hiſtory: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Ceballinus (who might with leaſt ſuſpicion) ſhould go to the Court, and utter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole buſineſs; deſiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promiſed to do, but did not. Two daies paſſed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter, but ſtill excuſed himſelf to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leiſure. This his coldneſs bred ſuſpicion, and cauſed Ceballinus to addreſs himſelf to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armory, who forthwith brought him to Alexanders preſence. Alexander, finding by examination what had paſſed between Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perſwade himſelf that this concealment of the treaſon, argued his hand to have been in the buſineſs. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traytor no other queſtion than this: Wherein have I ſo offended thee, that thou ſhouldeſt think Philotas more worthy to be a King than I? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had ſo wounded himſelf, that he lived no longer, than to give his laſt groan in the Kings preſence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the ſuſpicion, which his ſilence might juſtly breed. His anſwer was, That when the practice was revealed unto him by Nichomachus, he judging it to be but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithal, until he might have better information. This error of his, (if it were only an error) although Alexander, for the notorious ſervices of his Father Parmenio, of his Brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himſelf, had freely pardoned and given his hand for aſſurance; yet, by the inſtigation of Craterus, he again ſwallowed his Princely promiſe, and made his enemies his Judges. Curtius gives a note of Craterus in this buſineſs; How he perſwaded himſelf, that he could never find a better occaſion to oppreſs his private enemy, than by pretending Piety, and duty towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better, as it is moſt general, in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their private
In these fair colours of the publick good;
And, to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And, arm'd with Power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest rank of treacheries,
That no one action shall seem innocent:
Yea, valour, honor, bounty shall be made
As accessaries unto ends unjust:
And even the serivce of the State must lade
The needfull'st undertaking with distrust;
So that base vileness, idle Luxury,
Seem safer far, than to do worthily, &c.

Now, although it were so, that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a Banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to bind him, he cryed out upon the King in these words; O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is far more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himself (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeed, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a god). That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withal grieve for those that should live under such a one as would exceed the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firm perswasion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despight. See what a strange Monster Flattery is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that do not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to hear the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vile garments, and bound like a Thief; where he heard himself, and his absent Father, the greatest Captain of the World, accused; his two other Brothers, Hector and Nicanor having been lost in the present War. He was so greatly oppress with grief, as for a while he could utter nothing but tears, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he sank under those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that he disdained the language of his own Country; and so withdrawing himself, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so sharply inveighed against him, would not vouchsafe to hear his excuse. For not his enemies only were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselves, which of them should exceed in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which he used in his own defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nichomachus desired to know of Dimnus, what men of mark and power were his partners in the conspiracy (as seeming unwilling to adventure himself with mean and base Companions) Dimnus named unto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and some others; but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the party, and have incouraged Nichomachus. Indeed, as Philotas said well for himself, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certain proof, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforced by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that adversity being seldom able to bear her own burthen, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not always deserving it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoever it were, to avoid the extremity of resistless and unnatural torments, devised by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephestion, and others, Philotas accused his own self; being perswaded that they would have slain him forthwith. But he failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and blood, he was forced to deliver, not what he knew, but whatsoever best pleased their ears, that were far more mercilesse than death it self.

Aug. de civit. Dei. lib. 1. c. 6.

Of this kind of judicial proceeding St. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountains of tears, Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur; & cum quæritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur; & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas pœnas: non quia illud commisisse detegitur sed quia non commisisse nescitur. What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause; and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certainty: not because he is known to have committed the offence, but because others do not know that he hath not committed it?

It had been enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolaus, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in blood, the greatest motive of his own ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus, Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, indignum tam miti animo; ferina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abjecto homine, in silvestre animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is unworthy of so mild a spirit: It is even a beastly rage to delight in blood and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

Sen. de Clem. l. 1.

For the conclusion of this Tragedy, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made, were to give end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeed; For (saith he) in this case, they that speak truly, or they that deny falsly, come to one and the same end. Now while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lyncestes, Son in Law to Antipater, who had been three years in prison, should be slain: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected because they had followed Philotas; but when they had answered for themselves, that they knew no way so direct to win the Kings favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were dismist. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had served with great fidelity as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himself; Parmenio, that first opened the way into Asia; that had depress Attalus the Kings enemy; that had alwaies, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vanguard, that was no less prudent in counsel, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloved of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the death of his Son, though not upon the King (for it was unlikely that he would have dishonored his fidelity in his eldest age, having now lived threescore and ten years) yet upon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had possest themselves of his affection, it was resolved, that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was employed in this business, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loved best, who (to be short) finding him in Midia, and having Cleander and other murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings Letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militiæ domique clari viri; Multa sine Rege prospere, Rex sine illo nihil magnæ rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King; but the King, without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praise. lib. 7.

§. XVIII.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

WHen these things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Araspians, or Evergitans; he made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretary) their Governor, then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Menon to command over them. Here the Army, sometimes led by Parmenio, finds him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountain Taurus towards the East, where he built a City, which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seven thousand of his oldest Macedons, worn with age, and with travels of the War. The Arians, who since he left them were revolted, he subdued again by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now he resolves to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to pass over the great River of Oxus, which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Governor of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Army suffereth for want of Water, insomuch as when they came to the River River of Oxus, there dyed more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had loſt in any one Battel againſt the Perſians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after object unto him) he fought againſt women, and not againſt men; and not againſt their perſons, but their ſhadows. He found on the banks of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boats, bridges, or raff, but was forced to ſew together the hides that covered his carriages, and ſtuff them with ſtraw, and on them in ſix days to paſs over his Army; which Beſſus might eaſily have diſtreſt, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army afar off. He had formerly complained againſt Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tygris, and other paſſages; and yet now, when this trayterous ſlave had ſtiled himſelf a King, he durſt not perform any thing worthy of a ſlave. And therefore thoſe that were neereſt unto him, and whom he moſt truſted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own ſafety, and by the memory of Beſſus his treaſon and cruelty againſt Darius, bound him in the like manner, that he had done his Maſter, but with this difference, that he had the chain cloſed about his neck like a Maſtiff-Dog, and ſo was dragged along to be preſented to his Enemy.

In the mean while Alexander was arrived at a certain Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece; whoſe Iſſues had well-neer forgotten their Country-language. Theſe moſt cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the ſword, and deſtroyed their City. At this place he received Beſſus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the reſt that delivered him, he gave the Traytor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his Brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himſelf ſecure, ſome twenty thouſand Mountainers aſſaulted his Camp; in repelling whom he received a ſhot in the leg, the arrow-head ſticking in the fleſh, ſo as he was carried in a Horſe-litter, ſometime by the Horſemen, ſometime by the foot.

Soon after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samarchand, the regal City of the great Tamerlain. It had in compaſs threeſcore and ten furlongs (Curtius ſaith.) Here he received the Embaſſadors of the Scythians (called Avians) who offered to ſerve him.

The Bactrians are ſhortly again with the Sogdians ſtirred to rebellion, by the ſame Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the Traytor Beſſus. Many Cities were reſolvedly defended againſt him, all which, after victory, he defaced and razed, killing all therein. At one of theſe he received a blow on the neck, which ſtruck him to the ground, and much diſabled him for many days after. In the mean while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, againſt whom he employed Menedemus with three thouſand foot, and eight hundred horſe.

In the heat of theſe tumults Alexander marched on (if we may believe Curtius and others) till he came to the River of Tanais; upon whoſe bank he built another Alexandria, threeſcore furlongs in compaſs, which he beautified with houſes within ſeventeen days after the walls built. The building of this City is ſaid to have been occaſion of a War between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perſwading himſelf, that this new Town was fortified of purpoſe to keep him under. I do not well underſtand, why the Scythians, offering war in ſuch terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his own Souldiers to counterfeit ſickneſs for very fear, ſhould nevertheleſs make ſute for peace: neither find I the reaſon why Alexander (not intending the Conqueſt of thoſe Northern deſarts, but only the defence of his own bank) ſhould refuſe to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they ſhould agree to ſuffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victory deſcribed; in purſuit of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his Expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus have greatly miſtaken this River, which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runs between Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander paſt over, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarchand: But Tanais, which divides Aſia from Europe, is neer two thouſand miles diſtant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way deſart and unknown. So that Alexander had (beſides Jaxartes) the great River of Volga, and many others to ſwim over, ere he could recover Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have diſcovered with the Army that followed him, if he had employed all the time that he lived in Aſia in that travel.

Wherefore it is enough to believe, that the Aſiatique Scythians, making ſome offer to diſturb the erection of his new City, which was like to give ſome hinderance to their their excurſions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defenſive Arms, eaſily chaſed ſome ten or twelve miles; which is the ſubſtance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his journey, like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life-time he were as ſober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waſte Country, where he could find nothing but trees and ſtones, nor other buſineſs than to ſet up a Monument.

Threeſcore of the Macedonians are ſaid to have been ſlain, and one thouſand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might eaſily be in paſſing a great River, defended againſt them by good Archers. Of Scythian horſes one thouſand eight hundred were brought into the Camp, and many priſoners. It is forbidden by ſome Hiſtorians, and indeed it is hardly poſſible, to ſet down the numbers of ſuch as periſh in Battel: yet Cæſar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the Victors hath been ſo inquiſitive into the greatneſs of their own ſucceſs, that Writers have been able to deliver ſuch particulars by credible report, I hold it not unlawful to ſet down what we find; eſpecially when it ſerves to give light to the buſineſs in hand. The ſmall number which the Macedonians loſt; the omiſſion of the number which they ſlew (a thing not uſual in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may ſet out the greatneſs of Alexander) and the little booty that was gotten, do make it probable, that this War was no better than the repulſion of a few roving Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Moſcovite, without any boaſt) and therefore better omitted by ſome Hiſtorians, than ſo highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was aſſuring himſelf of thoſe Scythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill news that Menedemus was ſlain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him led) broken, and the greateſt numbers ſlain, to wit, two thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe. He therefore, to appeaſe the rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haſte he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and lays waſte all before him, not ſparing the innocent children, and ſo departs, leaving a new Governor in that Province.

To repair this loſs, he received a great ſupply of nineteen thouſand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Army he returns towards the South, and paſſeth the River of Oxus; on the South ſide whereof he built ſix Towns neer each other for mutual ſuccour. But he finds a new ſtart-up-Rebel, called Arimazes (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thouſand Souldiers, that defended againſt him a ſtrong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vain to win by fair words, he made choice of three hundred young men, and promiſed ten talents to the firſt, nine to the ſecond, and ſo in proportion to the reſt, that could find a way to creep up to the top thereof. This they performed with the loſs of ſome two and thirty of their men, and then made a ſign to Alexander, that they had performed his commandment. Hereupon he ſent one Cophes to perſwade Arimazes to yield the place; who, being ſhewed by Cophes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, yielded ſimply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his kindred) ſcourged and crucified to death; which puniſhment they well deſerved for neglecting to keep good watch in ſo dangerous a time. For the place, as ſeems by the deſcription, might eaſily have been defended againſt all the Armies of the World. But, what ſtrength cannot do, Mans wit, being the moſt forcible engine, hath often effected: Of which I will give you an example in a place of our own.

The Iſland of Sark, joyning to Garnſey, and of that Government, was in Queen Maries time ſurprized by the French, and could never have been recovered again by ſtrong hand, having cattel and corn enough upon the place to feed ſo many men as will ſerve to defend it, and being every way ſo inacceſſible, that it might be held againſt the Great Turk. Yet by the induſtry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this ſort regained. He anchored in the road with one Ship of ſmall burthen, and pretending the death of his Merchant; beſought the French, being ſome thirty in number, that they might bury their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappel of that Iſle; offering a preſent to the French of ſuch Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with condition that they ſhould not come athore with any weapon, no not ſo much as with a Knife) the Frenchmen yielded. Then did the Fleming, put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carkaſs, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebuſſes; The French received them at their landing; and ſearching every of them ſo narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rocks with great difficulty; ſome part of the French took the Flemiſh Boat, and rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promiſed, and what elſe elſe they pleaſed; but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappel, ſhut the door to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, ſet upon the French; they run to the Cliff, and cry to their company aboard the Fleming to come to their ſuccour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings yielded themſelves and the place. Thus a Fox-tail doth ſometims help well to piece out the Lyons-skin that elſe would be too ſhort.

§. XIX.

How Alexander ſlew his own friends.

AFter theſe Sogdian and Scythian Wars, we read of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other Frivolous matters, and that he committed the Government of Maracanda, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he ſlew him ſoon after, for valuing the virtue of Philip the Father before that of Alexander the ſon, or rather becauſe he objected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein he toucht him to the quick, the ſame being delivered in publick, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deſerved as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular ſaved his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himſelf, and when it was too late. Yet, to ſay the truth, Clytus his inſolency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, ſo the King in his (for neither of them were themſelves) forgat whom he went about to ſlay: for the grief whereof he tare his own face, and ſorrowed ſo inordinately, as, but for the perſwaſions of Caliſthenes, it is thought he would have ſlain himſelf.

Wine begat Fury, Fury matter of Repentance: But preceding miſchiefs are not amended by ſucceeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; obſtantem malis conatibus verecundiam removet; ubi poſſedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, ſed protrahit; Drunkenneſs both kindles and lays open every vice; it removes out of the way that ſhame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where wine gets the maſtery, all the ill that before lay hidden breaks out: drunkenneſs indeed rather diſcovers vices, than makes them.

Soon after this, Spitamines, who ſlew Beſſus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murthered by his Wife, and his head preſented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dacons alſo ſeized upon his Fellow-Conſpirator Dataphernes, and delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all theſe petty Rebels, diſpoſed of the Provinces which he paſt over, and went on with his Army into Gabaza, where it ſuffered ſo much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storm, as he loſt in one Tempeſt a thouſand of his Train. From hence he invaded the Sacans, and deſtroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cohortanes, who ſubmitted himſelf unto him, feaſted him greatly, and preſented him with thirty beautiful Virgins, among whom Roxana, afterwards his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians diſdained, yet none of them durſt uſe any freedom of ſpeech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his courſe towards India, having ſo increaſed his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thouſand armed men.

In the mean while he would needs be honored as a god: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he employed two pernicious Paraſites, Hagis and Cleo; whom Caliſthenes oppoſed: For, among many other honeſt arguments uſed to the aſſembly, he told Cleo, That he thought, that Alexander would diſdain the gift of God-head from his Vaſſals; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did ſometime follow the death of thoſe, who in their life time had done the greateſt things, yet it never accompanied any one as yet living in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and upon drink (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carowſing feaſt:) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and ſucceeding ages numbred among the gods. Alexander ſtood behind a partition, and heard all that was ſpoken, waiting but an opportunity to be revenged on Caliſthenes, who being a man of free ſpeech, honeſt, learned, and a lover of the Kings honor, was yet ſoon after tormented to death; not for that he had betrayed the King to others, but becauſe he never would condeſcend to betray the King to himſelf, as all his deteſtable flatterers did. For in a conſpiracy againſt the King made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confeſt) he cauſed Caliſthenes without confeſſion, accuſation or trial, to be torn aſunder upon the rack: This deed unworthy of a King, Seneca thus cenſureth, Hoc eſt Alexandri crimen æternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum fœlicitas redimet: Nam quoties quis dixerit, dixerit, Occîdit Perſarum multa millia; opponitur, & Caliſthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Occîdit Darium; opponitur, & Caliſthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus vicit, ipſum quoq; tentavit novis claſſibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciæ uſq; ad orientis terminos protulit; dicetur, ſed Caliſthenem occîdit. Omnia licèt antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla tranſierit, ex his quæ fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam ſcelus Caliſthenis; This is the eternal crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicity of his in War ſhall ever be able to redeem: For as often as any man ſhall ſay, He ſlew many thouſand Perſians; it ſhall be replyed, he did ſo, and he ſlew Caliſthenes. When it ſhall be ſaid, he ſlew Darius; it ſhall be replyed, and Caliſthenes. When it ſhall be ſaid, he wan all as far as the very Ocean, thereon alſo he adventured with unuſual Navies, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmoſt bounds of the Orient; It ſhall be ſaid withall, But he killed Caliſthenes. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples of Captains and Kings; none of all his acts make ſo much to his glory, as Caliſthenes to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders journey into India. The battel between him and Porus.

WIth the Army before remembred, of one hundred and twenty thouſand foot and horſe, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where ſuch of the Princes, as ſubmitted themſelves unto him, he entertained lovingly, the reſt he conſtrained, killing, Man, Woman, and Childe, where they reſiſted. He then came before Niſa, built by Bacchus, which after a few dayes was rendred unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feaſts for ten dayes together. Now when he had drunk his fill, he went on towards Dedula, and from thence to Acadera, Countreys ſpoyled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reaſon whereof, victuals failing, he divides his Army: Ptolomy led one part, Cenon another, and himſelf the reſt. They take many Towns, whereof that of greateſt fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thouſand men; but after ſome reſiſtance, it was yielded unto him by Cleophe the Queen, to whom again he reſtored it; at the ſiege of this City he received a wound in the leg. After this, Nora was taken by Polyſperchon, and a Rock of great ſtrength by himſelf: he wan alſo a paſſage upon one Eryx, who was ſlain by his company, and his head preſented to Alexander. This is the ſum of Alexanders doings in thoſe parts, before ſuch time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Coming to Indus, he found there Epheſtion, who (being ſent before) had prepared Boats for the tranſportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arrival, had perſwaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to ſubmit himſelf to this great Conquerour. Therefore, ſoon upon Alexanders coming, Omphis preſented himſelf with all the ſtrength of his Countrey, and ſix and fifty Elephants, unto him; offering him his ſervice and aſſiſtance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiaſares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleaſed, hoping by this diſ-union to make his own Victory by far the more eaſie. He preſented Alexander with a Crown of Gold, ſo did he the reſt of his Commanders, and withall fourſcore Talents of Silver Coyn; which Alexander not only refuſed, but to ſhew that he was covetous of glory, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thouſand Talents of his own treaſure, beſides other Perſian rarities. Abiaſares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemy Omphis into his protection, reſolved to make his own peace alſo: For, knowing that his own ſtrength did but equal that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference between them, than that which the chance of War gave, he thought it an ill match, when Alexander, who had already beaten under foot all the greateſt Princes of Aſia, ſhould make himſelf a Party and Head of the quarrel. So had Alexander none now to ſtand in his way but Porus, to whom he ſent a commandement, that he ſhould attend him at the border of his Kingdom, there to do him homage. But from Porus he received this manly anſwer; That he would ſatisfie him in his firſt demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgment he was reſolved to take counſel of his Sword. To be ſhort, Alexander reſolves to paſs over the River Hydaſpes, and to find Porus at his own home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirty thouſand foot, fourſcore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troop of Horſe. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had ſurely ſtayed ſomewhat longer ere he had ſeen India. The River was four furlongs broad, which makes half a mile, and withall deep and ſwift. It had in it many Islands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolomy up the River with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawn from his first incamping, sets himself down opposite to Ptolomy, supposing that the whole Army of Macedon, meant to force their passage there. In the mean while Alexander recovers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troops, and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather believes, that Abiasares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had been come over Hydaspes to his aid, than that Alexander had past it. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with four thousand Horse, and a hundred armed Waggons to entertain him. Each Waggon had in it four to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much rain, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vantguard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their rains, and other Furniture, overturning the Waggons, and those in them. Perdiccas also gave up the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were forc'd to recoil. Porus moves forward with the gross of his Army, that those of his Vanguard scattered might recover his Rear; Alexander being followed with Ephestion, Ptolomy, and Perdiccas, took on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to break upon Porus his battel of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himself being carried upon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters, being well guarded with the long and strong pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being inraged, they turned head, and ran over the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulness of the Macedonian Captains, the victory fell to Alexander, who also far exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his own Confederate and Country-people. Yet for his own person he never gave ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a prisoner to the Conquerour, from whom again he received his estate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How Alexander finished his Expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbear to trouble my self and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their travels: or of those petty Wars which Alexander made between the overthrow of Porus, and his sailing down the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better known unto us in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen between London and Stanes.

Our great traveller Mandevile, who died in the year 1372, and had seen so much of the World, and of the East India, we accounted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witness the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friers Guillimius in Liege, where the Religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honourable memoire de son Excellence; For an honourable memory of his Excellency, saith Guichardine. Guic. in Disc. of the Low Countries

The Countreys towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradis, Acesines, and the rest fall into the main stream, are now possest by the great Mogol the ninth from Tamberlain, who commands all the tract between Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Country towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a Ship of London, suffered shipwrack, in the year 1609. and some of the company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the same great City (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyanæus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells us, that those two great Captains (whom Alexander sought by all means to out-fame) when they endevoured to subject to them the Oxidracæ, a people inhabiting between the Rivers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the

the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordnance that those people had then in use. For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the Cannon many hundreds of years since, and even since their first civility and greatness, which was long before Alexander's time. But Alexander pierc'd not so far into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than ever to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander over those great Desarts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was nearer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a pretty trick, wherewith he hoped to beguile posterity, and make himself seem greater than he was. He enlarged his Camp, made greater trenches, greater Cabbins for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher Mangers than Horses could feed in. He caused all furniture of men and horses to be made larger than would serve for use; and scattered these Armours and Bridles about his Camp, to be kept as reliques, and wondred at by the Savages. Proportionable to these he raised up twelve great Altars to be the monument of his journeys end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bigness; to his greatness it could add nothing save a suspition, that it was less than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned again to the bank of Acesines, and there determined to set up his fleet, where Acesines and Hydaspes incounter; where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those Rivers two Cities: the one he called Nicæa, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucephalus. Here again he received a fourth supply of six thousand Thracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot; and from his Lieutenant at Babylon five and twenty thousand Armours, garnished with silver and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wan many Towns, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a City of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he pass'd down the River with his fleet, at which time also the news came unto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrival of an hundred Embassadours from a King of India, who submitted himself unto him. He feasted these Embassadours upon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be devised, who, soon after their dispatch, returned again with a present of three hundred Horses, one hundred and thirty Waggons, and to each of them four Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yield unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Samos was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poysoned swords, with one of which Ptolomy (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreamt he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neer the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies, as they were on a sudden shuffled one upon another by the Flood, so on the Ebb they were left on the dry ground, and on the sandy banks of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few dayes observed well the course of the Sea, he past out of the Rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to inform himself, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixth Book hath written this passage down the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Near the out-lets of this River, he ſpent ſome part of the Winter, and in eighteen dayes march from thence recovered Gedroſia, in which paſſage his Army ſuffered ſuch miſery for want of food, that of a hundred and twenty thouſand foot, and twelve thouſand horſe, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

§. XXII.

Of Alexanders Riot, Cruelty, and Death.

FRom Gedroſia, Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and ſo drawing near to Perſia, he gave himſelf wholly to feaſting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swiniſh vice be hatefull enough in it ſelf, yet it alwayes inflamed this King to Cruelty. For (ſaith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feaſt: for Aſpaſtes, one of his Provincial Governours, he commanded to be ſlain; ſo as neither did the exceſs of voluptuouſneſs qualifie his cruelty, nor his crueity hinder in ought his voluptuouſneſs.

While he refreſhed his Army in theſe parts, a new ſupply of five thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had been employed in the Killing of Parmenio. Againſt theſe Murderers, great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were ſo outragious, as Alexander was perſwaded, that, had they not altogether deſpaired of his return out of India, they durſt not have committed them. All men were glad of the occaſion, remembring the vertue of him, whom they had ſlaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chief, with ſix hundred Souldiers by them employed, were delivered over to the Hang-man: every one rejoycing that the Ire of the King was at laſt executed on the miniſters of his Ire.

Nearchus and Oneſicritus were now returned from the coaſt, and made report of an Iſland rich in gold, and of other ſtrange things; whereupon they were commanded to make ſome farther diſcovery: which done, that they ſhould enter the mouth of Euphrates, and find the King at Babylon.

Arrianus hath a far different deſcription of Cyrus Tomb.

As he drew near to Babylon, he viſited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Paſargada, now called Chalquera: where he was preſented with many rich gifts by Orſines, one of the Princes of Perſia, of the race of Cyrus. But becauſe Bagoas, an Eunuch in ſpecial favour with the King, was neglected; he not only practiſed certain looſe fellows to witneſs againſt Orſines, that he had robbed Cyrus Tomb, for which he was condemned to dye; but he aſſiſted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time alſo Alexander cauſed Phradites to be ſlain, ſuſpecting his greatneſs. Cæperat (ſaith Curtius) eſſe præceps ad repræſentanda ſupplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began head-longly to ſhed blood, and believe falſe reports. It is true, that he took a way to make all men weary of his Government, ſeeing cruelty is more fearful, than all adventures that can be made againſt it.

At this time it is ſaid, that Calanus the Philoſopher burnt himſelf, when he had lived threeſcore and thirteen years. Whether herein he followed the cuſtome of his Country, being an Indian, or ſought to prevent the grief and incommodity of elder age, it is uncertain: but in this the Hiſtorians agree, that fore-ſeeing and fore-ſhewing Alexanders death, he promiſed to meet him ſhortly after at Babylon.

From Paſargada he came to Suſa, where he married Statira Darius his eldeſt Daughter, giving her younger ſiſter to his beloved Epheſtion, and fourſcore other Perſian Ladies to his Captains. There were ſix thouſand gueſts invited to the feaſt, to each of which he gave a cup of gold. Here there came unto him three thouſand young Souldiers, out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treaſurer in Babylon, having laviſhly conſumed the moneys in his keeping, got him going with five thouſand Talents, and ſix thouſand hired Souldiers; but he was rejected in Greece, and there ſlain. Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with theſe forces and treaſures could not ſtirr: yet he ſent commandment, that they ſhould again receive their baniſhed men, whereunto (fearfull of his indignation) all ſubmitted themſelves (except the Athenians) though they reſolved, that it was a manifeſt preparation towards their bondage. After this, there followed a marvellous diſcontentment in his Army, becauſe he had reſolved to ſend into Macedon all thoſe old Souldiers which could no longer endure the travel of War, and to keep the reſt in Aſia. He uſed many Orations to ſatiſfie them, but it was in vain during the tempeſt of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawn to the Land with a twine-thred, when they have tumbled a while; ſo are the unconſiderate multitude eaſily conducted when their firſt paſſions are evaporate. With ſuch as were licenſed to depart, he he sent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellions Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed unto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly, if Alexander had not taken counsel of his cups, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have imployed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the War being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remove, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, do not stand in doubt of every man ill-affected, though valiant: but there is a kind of Kingly courage, compounded of hardiness and understanding, which is many times so fearfull unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to settle things there; where Ephestion, whom he favoured most of all men, dies. The King, according to the greatness of his love, laments his loss, hangs his Physician, and bestows upon his Monument twelve thousand talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himself, but to free himself. For if we believe Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gainsay) Antipater by his Sons, Cassander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gave him poyson; Thessalus (who was of the Conspiracy) having invited him to a drinking-feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drink stronger than Hercules himself, he quitted the World within a few dayes.

Certainly the Princes of the World have seldom found good, by making their Ministers over-great, and thereby suspicious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelity to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals, will never please himself with the price given. The only restorative, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodness and virtue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be, that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdoms ten or twelve years, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Cæsar did, after he had so long a time governed the Gauls, where he utterly forgat the art of obedience. A most cruel and ungrateful Traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belye him: For though he feared some ill measure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callisthenes, having been so lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolved to have given him some other great Government in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance desired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former War.

§. XXIII.

Of Alexanders person and qualities.

HOwsoever it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanity to be esteemed the Son of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drink and drunkenness, which others make the cause of his feaver and death. In that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what he should do when he had conquered the World, Augustus Cæsar found just cause to deride him, as if the well-governing of so many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have offered him matter more than aboundant, to busie his brains withall. That he was both learned, and a lover of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first Book of the Advancement of Learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His liberality, I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gave a whole City to one of his servants, he, to whom it was given, did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replyed, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: of which Seneca; Animosa vox videtur & regia, cùm sit stultissima. Nihil enim per se quenquam decet. Refert quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; habeatur personarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubiq; virtutis modus, æquè peccat quod excedit, quàm quod deficit; It seems a brave and Royal speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it self beseems a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations, no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas virtue is ever limited L. 2. de Ben. c. 1.

by

by measure, the excess is as faulty as the defect.

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man; a disposition, taken by it self, not much to be admired: For I am resolved, that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himself. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that virtue with the hardiness of Theeves, Ruffians, and Mastiff-Dogs. For certainly it is no way praiseworthy, but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawful enterprises, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings, and Common-weals.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the world, who have bought their glory with so great destruction and effusion of blood, I think him far inferiour to Cæsar, and many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted: nor was ever encountred with any Army of which he had not a most mastering advantage, both of Weapons and Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captains by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destiny (if we may use those terms) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his own, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdoms that invited and called in their own Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this judgement of them: Quod non minores fuere pestes mortalium, quàm inundatio, qua planum omne perfusum est, quàm conflagratio, qua magna pars animantium exaruit; They were no less plagues to mankind, than an overthrow of waters, drowning all the level; or some burning drought, whereby a great part of living creatures are scorched up.

CHAP. III.

The Reign of Aridæus.

§. I.

Of the Question about Succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Gyant Polyphemus, having lost his only eye. For that which is reported in Fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance uneffectual, and harmfull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the divine ordinance) were partly the uncertainty of Title to succession in the Kingdom of Macedon, partly the stubborn pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to be his heir, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soon taught unto spirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly been shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed unto himself the Kingdom, not rendring it unto Amyntas, (the Son of his elder Brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his own: by which bond, and much more by his own proper strength, he assured the Crown unto himself: Amyntas never attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the beginning of his reign. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole issue of this marriage, ought in reason to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereunto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, unless (peradventure) some Law of that Nation forbad the reign of Women. But the excellent virtue of these two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their own bodies: and so great were their Conquests, that Macedon it self was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laid in ballance against the demand of their posterity, had they left any able able to make challenge of the Royal Seat.

Alexander having taken many Wives, had issue by none of the principal of them. Barsine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, had born unto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly married) was left by him great with child. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alledged in Barr of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their own ends, under the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a Sister of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, and Aridæus his base Brother (Son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had marryed the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspition, that either Law or Custom had made that Sex uncapable of the Soveraignty: Aridæus (besides his bastardy) was neither for person nor quality fit to rule as King; yet upon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsellors having overlaboured their disagreeing wits in devising what was best, were content for very weariness to take what comes next to hand.

Ptolomy (soon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the half-Persian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be given to the Captains; that going for Law, which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so far was he from acknowledging any one as true Heir to the Crown.

This Ptolomy was called the Son of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having used the company of Arsinoë Ptolomy's Mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus, being great with child. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of those dissentions, which are incident unto the consultations of many ambitious men, equal in place, forcing them at length to redeem their quiet with subjection to one, deserving regard by his blood, and trust for his even carriage; or whether he desired only to get a share to himself, which could not have come to pass, had all been given to one: plain enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridæus before himself: and therefore gave such counsel as fitted his own and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his took place indeed, though not in form as he had propounded it; For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexanders empty Chair, as Ptolomy had conceived the form of their consultations, or to set in the Chair such a King as Aridæus, no wiser than the Chair it self. Also the Controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captains; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shews of dissembling aspirers do often take check by the plain-dealing of them who dare to go more directly to work: so was it like to have fared with Ptolomy and the rest, when Aristonus, another of the Captains, interpreted the very words of Alexander, saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his own purchases: and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose anothers construction: every one being uncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not be of the latest, urged Perdiccas to take upon him the estate Royal. He was no stranger to the Royal blood; yet his birth gave him not such reputation, as the great favour of his dead King, with whom he had been very inward, and that especially since the death of Ephestion (a powerfull Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much proof of his private valour. But very surly he was: which quality (joyned with good fortune) carried a shew of Majesty: being checkt with misadventure, it was called by a true name, Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present business a foolish over-weening did him as great harm, as it had been great happiness to have succeeded Alexander. For, not content to have the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Aristonus, he would needs counterfeit modesty; thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the less envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that feigneth himself a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolf. Meleager, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly inveighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heir to the Crown, the souldiers ought to be heirs to the Treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captains were left alone, far enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoil, thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The Election of Aridæus, with the troubles thereabout arising; the first Division of the Empire.

During this up-roar, mention was made of Aridæus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, untill at last it grew to the voice of the Army. Meleager having withdrawn himself tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so fair an occasion to make himself great: therefore he produced Aridæus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, investing him in Alexander's Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vain: for they could not resolve what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, took upon him to proclaim the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsel which Perdiccas at first had given, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But the child was not yet born, which made that attempt of Python vain. Finally, Perdiccas with six hundred men, and Ptolomy with the Kings Pages, took upon them to defend the place where Alexanders body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in upon them, and inforced them to accept Aridæus for their Soveraign Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of Royal blood, a goodly Gentleman, and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing upon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion that should happen among the Infantry. The King (who was governed by Meleager) commanded, or gave leave to have Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such gravity, that they departed honester than they came; being sorry for their bad enterprise. Upon the news of this attempt, the Camp was in an up-roar, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as having newly got the Crown by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it self afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said that no harm was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, untill the King by offering to resign his estate unto them, renewed out of their pity that favourable affection, which had moved them to set him up at the first.

Perdiccas having now joyned himself with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all provision of victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing between the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of sedition given up into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be joyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in government of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should have done well to consider, That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principal place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked under their great facility. General peace was renewed, and much love protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had been in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windy spirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own disgrace, but in such terms as might seem to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himself; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischievously laid. Had Meleager given way to seditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a ſower of diſſention, and thereby with a publick approbation might have been cut off, as having often offended in that kind; his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now ſeeking redreſs of theſe diſorders, he haſtened his own ruine, by a leſs formal, but more ſpeedy way. This kind of Muſter was very ſolemn, and practiſed with many ceremonies, as for cleanſing the Army. The Horſe-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries were each according to their quality ſet in array, apart from others, as if they had been of ſundry ſorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmiſh (as by way of exerciſe) according to the direction of their ſeveral Captains. But at that time the great battel of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpoſe beſtowed in a ground of diſadvantage; and the countenance of the Horſe and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them, was ſuch, as diſcovered no jeſting paſtime, nor good intent. Kings were always wont to fight among the horſemen: of which cuſtom Perdiccas made great uſe that day, to the utter confuſion of his enemies. For Aridæus was always governed by him, who for the preſent had him in poſſeſſion. Two or three days before, he ſought the death of Perdiccas at the inſtigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and down about the footmen, commanding them to deliver unto the death all ſuch as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were caſt unto the Elephants, and by them ſlain, in the preſence of the King (who ſhould have defended them) and of their affrighted companions. But theſe three hundred were not the men whoſe puniſhment Meleager had expected: they were ſuch as had followed him, when he diſturbed the firſt conſultation that was held about the election of a new King, and ſome of them his eſpecial friends. Having therefore kept himſelf quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them that had the advantage; when he ſaw their proceedings tend very manifeſtly to his deſtruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they ſent and ſlew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Council of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themſelves; leaving to Aridæus the office of a Viſitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whoſe body having been ſeven days neglected, was opened and embalmed by the Egyptians: no ſign of poyſon appearing, how great ſoever the ſuſpicion might be. The charge of his burial was committed to Aridæus, one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and coſtly ſhew, making a ſtately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarſes of his friends being laid in the ground before that of Alexander was beſtowed in Alexandria, a City of his own building, in Egypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian War.

WHileſt theſe things were in doing, or preſently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principal Noblemen, and inferior to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the reſt, were buſied in Greece with a War, which the Athenians more bravely than wiſely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did proſecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the baniſhed Greeks (few excepted) ſhould be reſtored unto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Eſtates, and therefore thought ſo to provide, that in every City he would have a ſure party, But it fell out otherwiſe: For he loſt the hearts of many more than he won by this proud injunction. His pleaſure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being againſt all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in eſtate, but retaining more than was needful of their ancient ſpirits, forbad the execution of this Decree in their Dominions; ſo did alſo the Ætolians who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them took Arms, but ſeemed to bear themſelves, as men that had done no more than they might well Juſtifie by reaſon: nevertheleſs to prevent the worſt, the Athenians gave ſecret inſtructions to Leoſthenes, a Captain of theirs, willing him to levy an Army, but in his one name, and to keep it in a readineſs for their uſe. This was no hard thing for Leoſthenes to do: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Aſian War in poor eſtate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captains. Of theſe he had gathered up eight thouſand, when the certain news was brought of Alexanders death: at which the City of Athens declared it ſelf, and more honorably than wisely, proclaimed War against the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians and some other Estates, gave battel to the Bœotians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his own strength) was fain to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vain than the fears and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies a far off, which deceive all mortal wisdom, even when they seem near at hand. One month was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedon to convey home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succeed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The suspitions were strong that he had a privy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better; which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly to be levied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes give out speeches, testifying his own jealousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruel Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were mean persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could find rebellious purposes (for so he interpreted even lewd government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having sitten Vice-roy ten years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of to fell a Master, and the envy of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equal. Therefore whether his fear drew him to prevention, working first the Kings death by poyson, given by his Son Iolaus, Alexanders Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth untill opportunity had changed it into the passion of revenge, which was cruelly performed by his son Cassander; great cause of much fear he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few years.

At the present, Craterus was sent for, and all the Captains of companies lying near, solicited to make haste. Not without cause: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteen thousand foot, and six hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countrey being emptied into Asia. The Thessalians indeed who had long stood firm for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horsemen of Greece, furnished him with very brave troops, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessaly try the fortune of a battel with Leosthenes; rather (as may seem) fearing the increase of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater lost the day; and his loss was such, that he neither was able to keep the field, nor to make a safe retreat into his own Country; therefore he fled into the Town of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to bear out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battel again, and upon refusal close up the Town with Earth-works, and a Wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the last honorable enterprize that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

§. IV.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

KIng Aridæus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his own Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatness consisting in a bare Title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make use of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his own peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his Government. A stronger Army than any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that unsettled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have been. The better to accompliſh his deſires, he cloſely ſought the marriage of Cleopatra, the ſiſter of Alexander; yet about the ſame time he either married Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, or made ſuch love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not ſomewhat narrowly ſearch into his doings.

then

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the ſecond of that name, and tenth King of that Country, had continued faithful to the Perſian Empire as long as it ſtood: following the example of his fo re-fathers, even from Pharnaces the firſt that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atoſſa ſiſter to the great Cyrus. Some of his Anceſtors had (indeed) been oppreſſed by the Perſian: but what Fortune took from them at one time, Vertue reſtored at another, and their faithful Princes had much encreaſed all. But now in the fatal Period of ſo great an Empire, with much wiſdom, and (Darius being ſlain) with ſufficient honor, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perſians room. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater buſineſs wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honor of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdom, ſurrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian conqueſt, and for his own particular, to have one opportune place of ſure retreat, under the government of a ſtedfaſt friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field 30000 foot, and 15000 horſe (a ſtrong Army, had it not encountred a ſtronger, and better trained) wan the victory, and thereby the whole Kingdom. But with much cruelty did he uſe the victory: for having taken Ariarathes priſoner, with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon, and ſo delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he truſted moſt. Another part of his forces he had committed to Python, rather as to the moſt honorable of ſuch as remained about him, than as to the moſt aſſured. Python was to ſubdue the Greeks rebelling in the high Countries of Aſia. About twenty thouſand foot, and 3000 horſe they were (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander to bridle the barbarous nations, were ſoon weary of their unpleaſant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they lived: and therefore took advantage of the preſent troubles to ſeek unto themſelves a better fortune. Againſt theſe Python went, more deſirous to make them his own, than to deſtroy them: which intent of his Perdiccas discovering, did both give him in charge to put all thoſe Rebels to the ſword, giving the ſpoils of them to his Souldiers, and further injoyned it upon Pythons Captains (his own creatures) that they ſhould ſee his commandment executed. Theſe directions for uſe of the victory, might have proved needleſs; ſo uncertain was the victory it ſelf. A Captain of the Rebels commanding over three thouſand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtful) retire without neceſſity to a hill not far off. This diſmayed the reſt, and gave the day to Python: who being far enough from Perdiccas, offered compoſition to the vanquiſhed, granting unto them their lives and liberty, under condition of laying down their arms; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being Maſter of theſe companies, he might well have a good opinion of his own power: all power being then valued by ſtrength in followers, when as none could vaunt himſelf as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteen thouſand foot, and eight thouſand eight hundred horſe, beſides these new Companions, whom needleſs fear without great loſs had cauſed to leave the field: but in true eſtimation, all the greatneſs whereof Python might think himſelf aſſured, was (and ſoon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe, of thoſe which followed Python, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoyned to give aſſiſtance to that buſineſs; and by virtue of the precept given unto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all thoſe poor men who had yielded themſelves; leaving Python as naked as he came forth to return unto his great Maſter.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leiſure to purſue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himſelf Lord of all: but this muſt be ſecretly carried for fear of oppoſition. How it ſucceeded, will appear when the Lamian War taketh ending.

§. V.

The proceſs of the Lamian War.

WE left Antipater hardly beſieged, wanting means to free himſelf without ſuccours from his friends in Aſia. Thoſe helps not appearing ſo ſoon as he expected, he came to parley with Leoſthenes, and would have yielded unto any terms of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victory, do seldom limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himself to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremity, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Town, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring War the Ætolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or haveing business which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their own Countrey. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found means to sally out upon his enemies to their great loss: for many were slain, and Leosthenes himself among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Town. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deal with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lysimachus, who was neerest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, against Seuthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field above four times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without loss, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly solicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygia the less, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; whether levied out of his Province, or appointed unto him out of the main Army, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chief City of Macedon, and very kindly offering her self to be his Wife; which letters he kept not so close as had been requisite, and therefore brought himself into great suspicion, that soon ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen General by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approach, forsook the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evil welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyn in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the odds of two thousand Thessalians; in other things he was equal with him; n cause he thought himself Superior, in the fortune of that day he proved so: for he wan a great victory (chiefly by virtue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himself; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marish piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. He was the first of Alexanders Captains which dyed in battel; but all, or most of the rest shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did never any thing suitable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, and too proud to flie. They betook themselves to high grounds unfit for service on horseback, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following, Antipater with his men came into their Camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battel. But still Antipater kept himself on ground of advantage; which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This wretchlesness (incorrigible in an Army of Voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians, labouring to have made themselves once again Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatal captivity of Greece came on, of which she never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and coming into Thessaly, joyned himself with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus being joyned in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse; in foot, eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to avoid the necessity of a battel, until such time as the Towns confederate should return unto the Camp those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater ſo urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Theſſalians had the upper hand, and held it, until ſuch time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which cauſed them alſo to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little elſe to boaſt of, conſidering that with the loſs of an hundred and thirty men, they had only purchaſed the death of ſome five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great uſe made: For the Greeks, as not ſubject unto the full command of one General, and being every one deſirous to preſerve his own eſtate and City: concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a ſubtle Artificer, and well underſtanding their aptneſs to diviſion, refuſed to hearken to any general compoſition, but willed every City to deal apart for it ſelf. The intent of his device was ſo apparent, that it was rejected: the Greeks chooſing rather to abide the coming of their aſſiſtants, whoſe unreaſonable careleſneſs betrayed the cauſe. Antipater and Craterus beſieging and winning ſome Towns in Theſſaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their own aſſured and preſent calamity.

§. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demoſthenes his death.

THe Theſſalians falling off, all the reſt ſoon followed ſeverally, and ſued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the moſt forward, inviting ſuch as were ſlack. Only the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this tumult, and their fear was not great; the ſeat of the war being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who ſate ſtill at Athens, deviſing upon courſes of proſecuting the War to come, which came to their doors before their conſultation could find iſſue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to reſiſt, and were as heartleſs as friendleſs. All that remained was to ſend Embaſſadors, deſiring peace upon ſome good terms: neceſſity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worſt. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philoſopher, were chief of this Embaſſage; Phocion, as the moſt honorable; Demades, as a ſtrong perſwader (both of them well reſpected by Antipater;) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wiſdom, gravity of manners, and virtue; but all theſe ornaments conſiſting in ſpeculation, and therefore of leſs regard, when their admiration was to coſt them much in real effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leoſthenes, required of the Athenians, that they ſhould wholly ſubmit themſelves to his pleaſure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the War paſt, to pay a fine, and entertain a Garriſon. Further, he abrogated the popular eſtate, committing the government of the City to thoſe of moſt wealth, depriving of the right of ſuffrage all ſuch as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thouſand they were, all men of good ſubſtance, to whom the adminiſtration of the Commonwealth was given; a number great enough to retain the name and form of a Democracy. But the raſcal multitude of beggarly perſons, accuſtomed to get their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voyces, cryed out, that this was a meer Oligarchy, the violent uſurpation of a few incroaching upon the publick right. Theſe turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to ſay, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to moleſt the quiet of Athens.

To the ſame end (yet withal for ſatisfying his own ſuſpitions and hatred) he cauſed Demoſthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with ſome others, to be ſlain. Had the death of theſe two, eſpecially of Demoſthenes, been forborn, the reſt of his proceedings in this action might well have paſſed for very mild; whereas now, all ſuch as either are delighted with the Orations of Demoſthenes, or have ſurrendred their judgements to Authors juſtly admiring him, as the moſt eloquent of all that ever did ſpeak and write, condemn him utterly, calling him a bloody Tyrant. Such grace and reputation do the Learned Arts find in all Civil Nations, that the evil done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemiſh any action, how good ſoever otherwiſe it be, or honorably carried.

Demoſthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Iſle of Calauria; there there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswaded him to leave the place; but no so prevailing, he threatned violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite, as it had been to write somewhat, secretly took poyson, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to do the last execution upon himself, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battel, howsoever valiant in perswading to enterprizes, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great sums given him by the Persian, to encourage him, in finding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (me thinks) in taking from the Persians which loved not his Country, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countries good; which he did not cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honorable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) believe Lucian, who tells us, That it was Antipaters purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a stedfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chief command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and lover of his Country, yet applying himself to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet favourable to the vanquished) he endeavoured carefully to preserve.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Ætolian wars into Asia. The grounds of the first civil war between the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose poverty was not so easily daunted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerful State of Athens had been. Their Country was rough and mountainous, having many places of great fastness, into which they conveyed such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for War: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacy did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut up all passages, and utterly debarred them of relief, then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight upon equal ground, with unequal numbers, or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yield themselves to the Macedonians, who, incensed by the loss of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave so stubborn enemies in places which might give confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremity much fineness of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt consideration of that only which at the present is in hand. These Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such news came out of Asia into the Macedonians Camp as made Antipater and Craterus think every hour a month, till they had rid their hands of these Ætolians, giving them whatsoever conditions they would ask: yet with purpose to call them to severe account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death, or by captivity, when once they should have settled the affairs of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is disposer: in whose high Counsel it was ordained, that this poor Nation should continue a troublesome bar to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchy) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it served meerly as an introduction to all the civil Wars ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiatique Expedition, which did set the world in an uproar, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captains the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedency, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next unto these had Perdiccas been; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equal, or superior, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to have consorted with these two, and to have been with them a third partner in the Government of all; to which purpose he entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of wind which bore him up, he began to take wing and soar quite another way. Aridæus was a very simple man, yet served well enough to wear the title of that Majestie, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become Proprietary, the practice was more severe than had been in the days of Alexander: the desire to seem terrible, being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other means of preserving themselves from contempt, and of giving such a fiery lustre to their actions, as may dazle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been shewed. The Pisidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfeit Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children sold for slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians, by this example grown desperate, when after two or three days trial they found themselves unable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses, and set the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Army had no other work than to sift the ashes of the burnt City for gold and silver; but Perdiccas had business of greater importance troubling his brains. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without employment, letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and took deep root in their several Provinces. He purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seat of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the Offices of his Vice-Roys (during the time) actually void; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdiccas holding authority, the match with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatness meet with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomy might give, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with love of the people; yet if the business prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himself, or be driven to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then Governing in Phrygia, a busie-headed man, and ill affected to the side, was to be looked into and made away, for fear of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of War, of as deep a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great undertaking, as any of Alexanders Captains. His imployments had been less than some of theirs, which made him also the less respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for he valued himself by his own worth, not by the opinions of other men; with careful attention had he watched Perdiccas, and sounded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discover. For Perdiccas having with a jealous eye pryed into the demeanor of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turn; caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Judge that sought his death. This device Antigonus would not seem to perceive, but prepared himself in shew to make answer, indeed, to make escape; which easily he did, putting himself and his Son Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings as finished the Ætolian War before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceive their own danger: so his flight gave Perdiccas to understand that his intentions were laid open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not only for defence, but (as having on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomy being advertised of these proceedings, and considering how nearly they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his Government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chief Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboyls he celebrated the funeral of Alexander with great solemnity, purchasing thereby to himself much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Army coming against him.

§. VIII.

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

Perdiccas, uncertain which way to bend his main power, at length reſolved to ſet upon Ptolomy; leaving Eumenes to keep to his uſe, againſt Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Aſia bordering upon Europe.

It may ſeem ſtrange, that he did not rather make head againſt thoſe who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomy; or believed that Craterus would not be ready for him ſoon enough. Sure it is, that he took a bad courſe and made it worſe with ill handling.

Ptolomy by his ſweet behaviour allured many to his party, without help of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwiſe was full of inſolency, which never fails to be rewarded with hatred; which is truly defined, An affection founded upon opinion of an unjuſt contempt. The whole ſtory of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilful man) tired his followers, and waſted them in hard enterprizes without ſucceſs. His moſt forceable attempt was upon a little Town, called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by night, with more haſte than good ſpeed; for Ptolomy preventing him, did put himſelf into the place, where behaving himſelf not only as a good Commander, but as a ſtout Souldier, he gave the foil to Perdiccas, cauſing him to retire with loſs, after a vehement, but vain aſſault, continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another journey (which was his laſt) and came to the diviſions of Nilus, over againſt Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to paſs over his Army into an Iſland, where he meant to incamp. The current was ſtrong, the water deep, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the paſſage, to break the violence of the ſtream, and his horſemen beneath it, to take up ſuch as were carried away by ſwiftneſs of water. A great part of his Army being arrived on the further bank, the channel began to wax deep; ſo that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chin, they who ſhould have followed could find no footing. Whether this came by the riſing of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of ſo many Men, Horſe, and Elephants) no remedy there was, but ſuch as had paſſed muſt repaſs again, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the enemy, and could not be relieved by their fellows. With great confuſion therefore they committed themſelves to the River, wherein above two thouſand of them periſhed, a thouſand were devoured by Crocodiles, a miſerable ſpectacle even to ſuch as were out of danger; ſuch as were ſtrong and could ſwim, recovered the Camp; many were carried down the ſtream, and driven to the contrary bank, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exaſperated the Souldiers againſt their General, giving liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the evil thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, news came from Ptolomy, which did ſet them in an up-roar. Ptolomy had not only ſhewed much compaſſion on thoſe who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of Funeral to the dead carkaſſes, which the River had caſt upon his ſide: and finally, ſent their bones and aſhes to be interred by their Kinſmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldiers, but made the Captains fall to mutiny, thinking it unreaſonable to make war upon ſo vertuous and honorable a perſon, to fulfil the pleaſure of a Lordly ambitious man, uſing them like ſlaves. The ſedition growing ſtrong, wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the diſgrace which he had ſuffered by his procurement, after the victory upon the rebellious Greeks. Python had lived in honorable place about Alexander; he was in the diviſion of the Provinces made Governor of Media; he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorſhip excepted) equal to him, had nevertheleſs been ſcornfully uſed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captains, and a good part of the Horſe, which conſiſted of the Gentry (the footmen having declared themſelves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumſtance they all ran upon him, and ſlew him. Such end had the proud miſ-governing authority of Perdiccas. He might have lived as great as any, could he have ſuffered any as great as himſelf; yea, peradventure maſter of all, had he not been too maſterly over thoſe which were already his.

The next day Ptolomy came into the Camp, where he was joyfully received; he excuſed himſelf of things paſt, as not having been Author, or given cauſe of the War, and was eaſily believed: the favour of the Army being ſuch toward him, that needs they they would have made him Protector in the room of Perdiccas. But this he refuſed. It was an Office fit for one that would ſeek to increaſe his greatneſs with his trouble. Ptolomy was well enough already; wherefore, for his own quiet he forbare to accept it, and for their well-deſerving of him, he procured that honourable charge to Python, and to Aridæus the Captain, who having had ſome companies of Souldiers, to furniſh with their attendance the ſolemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him againſt Perdiccas.

In the midſt of theſe buſineſſes came news of two great Victories obtained by Eumenes; which news, had they arrived two or three dayes ſooner, had been entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would have given ſuch reputation to Perdiccas, as had cauſed both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable compoſition. But theſe good tidings coming in ill time, when death had ſtopped the ears which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Aſia.

BEfore we proceed in the relation of things happening about the perſon of the King, it is meet that we ſpeak of thoſe buſineſſes in the lower Aſia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whileſt Perdiccas was occupyed in the Egyptian Wars. Alcetas the Brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Perdiccas to be aſſiſtant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat anſwer that he would not; alledging the backwardneſs of his men to bear Arms againſt ſo great a perſon as Antipater, and a man ſo much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make fair ſhew, but inwardly he repined at the precedency given to Eumenes, as thinking himſelf the better man. Eumenes diſcovering, through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the miſchief lurking in his heart, wiſely diſſembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and ſweet language, that commonly are loſt, when beſtowed upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himſelf, that he might ſtand upon his own ſtrength, he raiſed out of the Countries under his juriſdiction, about ſix thouſand Horſe, giving many priviledges to ſuch as were ſerviceable, and training them well up. Not without great need. For when upon advertiſement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly paſſed the Helleſpont) for the invaſion of his Provinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in hoſtile manner, though unprovoked, preſented him Battel. Neoptolemus had ſecretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the Conqueſt of Aſia, which now intending to perform, he was ſhamefully diſappointed. For, though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his Battels; yet were his horſe driven out of the field, and himſelf compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in ſuch wiſe, that caſting down their Pikes, they cryed for mercy, and gladly took their oath to do him faithful ſervice. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promiſes to draw Eumenes into their ſociety, who contrariwiſe offered himſelf as a mean of reconciliation, between Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; profeſſing withall his hatred to Antipater, and conſtant faith to the cauſe which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whileſt theſe negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater, and his Aſſociates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe (at which fooliſh railing they laught) but extolling the virtue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; aſſuring them, that if Craterus did but once appear, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Camp, the Victory was won; for they would all forthwith revolt unto him. Earneſtly therefore he deſired them to give him aid againſt Eumenes, and eſpecially requeſted that Craterus might have the leading of the Army to be ſent. Their own affections did eaſily lead them to condeſcend to his motion: a good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevail as much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midſt of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betook themſelves to the Perſian faſhions of garments and cuſtoms, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and apparrel; whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld theſe new tricks of Aſia with diſcontented eyes, as reproachful and derogatory to the manners of their native Country. So Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to joyn with Ptolomy. Craterus used great celerity, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captains, after a great Victory. But he had a wary and well-advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espial upon him, and with much wisdom fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not fail to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant that Craterus was able to defeat him without Battel, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was such, as much exceeded his own footmen, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more uneasie to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange piece of work, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wise managing prosperously accomplished. He gave out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to joyn with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised and hated among them, (as having been vanquished by some of them, and forsaken others in plain field, whilest they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded that no messenger nor trumpeter should be admitted; and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him, had he been known: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himself. To these also he gave in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run upon the enemy; and gave him no leisure to say, or do any thing but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not fail to execute in his own person: but placing himself in the right wing of his Battel, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he understood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which having ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journeys, which over-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitful issue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in surprising them as enemies) to discover himself to his old friends, and fellow-souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phœnix a Tenidian, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who, mindful of their instructions began to give battel upon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redeem, he bade his men fight, and redeem the day, and take the spoil to themselves; but the Bear, whose skin he sells, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the Battel was fought, gave most advantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus; who, as soon as they had discovered one another, could not contain themselves, but with great rage met body to body, and letting loose their bridles, grappled, so violently together, that their horses ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first up, but Eumenes had his sword first drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall down and fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving slight ones, took such as were deadly, by which he died in the place, and was there (being half-dead, half-alive) stripped by his mortal enemy, whose revilings he requited, lying even at the last gasp, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to run away upon the spurre, and seek shelter behind the Battels of their Foot. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himself to carry succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly born himself a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phœnix with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not unlikely that he might have either carried the day, or preserved himself to a better adventure by giving ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slain) did. But whilst he sought to preserve his reputation, he lost his life by the fall of his Horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received; upon which accident he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and so perished unknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having alwayes loved and honoured Craterus, of whoſe death he was now become the inſtrument. The vanquiſhed Army entertained a treaty of peace with Eumenes, making ſhew of willingneſs to become his followers; but their intent was only to refreſh themſelves, which (by his permiſſion) having done, they ſtole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This Battel fought within ten dayes of the former, wan to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily; and the Armies lying further off were inraged with the news. But other matters there were which incenſed men againſt him, beſides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifeſtly appeared, that he was as ſorry as any that pretended greater heavineſs. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wiſely amended, by giving to them the ſpoil of ſuch Towns as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meer motion appointed unto him a Guard for defence of his perſon. Others were not ſo eaſie to be reconciled. They who had been Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulneſs, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their falſhood; neither found they any fairer way of excuſing their late revolt, than by accuſing and condemning the ſide which they had forſaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to dye: but it was an eaſier matter to give that ſentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queen, and Python the Protector. Python reſigns his Office, into which Antipater is choſen.

Python and Aridæus being choſen Protectors of King Aridæus, and the children of Alexander; took the way to Aſia the leſs, conducting the Army thorow Syria. Of theſe two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to ſuſtain ſo important a Charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridæus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a maſculine ſpirit, well underſtanding what ſhe was or ſhould be, and thinking her ſelf able to ſupport the weight which fortune laid upon her fooliſh husband, being due to her own title. Her mother Cyna, Siſter to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath been ſhewed) to Amyntas, who was the right Heir to the Kingdom of Macedon, being the only Son of King Perdiccas, Philips elder Brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; ſhe had led Armies, and (as a true Siſter of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Cæria Queen of the Phrygians, a Virago, like unto her ſelf, had ſlain her. She brought up this Eurydice in the ſame unwomanly Art of War, who now among the Souldiers began to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the ſmall contentment of Python, that could not brook her too curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were ſo, that Python had ſome purpoſe to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom, (as once he had ſought to do;) or whether the Queen did ſuſpect him of ſome ſuch intent; or whether only deſire of rule cauſed her to quarrel with him; quarrel ſhe did, which diſturbed the proceeding againſt Eumenes. The Army having ſhaken off ſuch a rank-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined thread. Python bearing himſelf upon his office, took upon him to give directions in the Kings name, which the Queen did oftentimes controll, uſing the ſame name with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python ſeeing this, would needs reſign his office, whether upon wearineſs of the contentions daily growing, or on purpoſe to bring the Queen into envy, it is uncertain. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worthieſt man in the Camp, he ſhould be intreated to retain the place, and have his authority confirmed, or (as might be) increaſed, were it but for want of a fit Succeſſor. Eurydice was nothing ſorry at this courſe; for now ſhe thought to manage the affairs of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troubleſome aſſiſtance of a Protector. But the Souldiers diſappointed both her and Python of their contrary expectations; chuſing Antipater, the only powerful man of Alexanders Captains, then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, and began to deal earneſtly with the Macedonians, that they ſhould acknowledge no Lord ſave only the King their Soveraign. Yet ſhe failed of her purpoſe, being hindred (as may ſeem) by three things: the apparent weakneſs of her husband; the growth of Alexanders children, who (though born of outlandiſh women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightineſs of Antipater, who commanding a great Army near at hand, arrived in few dayes at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her ſelf content. Antipater was of ſuch power, that he needed not to work by any cloſe devices, as Per- diccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governours of Provinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better; yea many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queen, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus General of the Royal Army: to whom for his good services done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gave the rule of Susiana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the Government of Asia during that War.

§. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, wins a Battel of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HEre begins the greatness of Antigonus, whose power in few years over-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it self over the whole Monarchy. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alcetus, the Brother, and Attalus the Brother-in-law to Perdiccas: work enough to keep his Army imployed in the publick service, till such time as he might find occasion to make use of it in his own business. The first of these which he undertook, was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to joyn, having unseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needful provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tryed all wayes of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Army with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himself had scattered abroad those Letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captains as he thought most easie to be won. Of these Captains one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any help was near him, yet looking so carelesly to himself, that he and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery secret, reserving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the treason which this false man, Apollonides, had undertaken. Antigonus presented battel to Eumenes; in the heat whereof Apollonides, General of the Horse to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traiterous practice had brought upon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himself into the troops of Antigonus, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the loss of that Battel, which disabled him utterly to keep the field, and left it very hard for him to make a safe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himself to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the Victory, to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilest Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compass, returned to the place where the Battel had been fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raising up heaps of earth as mountains over them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Camp) great admiration of his brave spirit: so the news which Menander (who was set to look unto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plain, careless, as after an assured Victory, and loaden with the spoils of many Nations, the rewards of their long service; all which he might have taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should prove a heavy burden to him, whose chief hope consisted in swift expedition, he gave secret warning to Menander to fly to the mountains, whilest he detained his men (whom authority could not have restrained) by this sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to ravish their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborn to do this out of any good will to them; but out of meer subtilty had avoided those precious fetters, which would have hindred his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only think all carriages to be over-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than available in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselves; and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred foot. When he had wearied Antigonus gonus a while in following him up and down, he came to Nora, where again keeping no more about him than neceſſity required to make good the place, he lovingly diſmiſſed all the reſt. Nora was a little fortreſs in the borders of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, ſo ſtrongly ſituated, that it ſeemed impregnable, and ſo well victualled and ſtored with all neceſſaries, that it might hold out for many years. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more deſire to make him his friend, than to vanquiſh him in War. To this purpoſe he entertained parley with him, but in vain. For, whereas Antigonus offered him pardon and his love; Eumenes required reſtitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters conſent. Then was Nora cloſed up; where Antigonus leaving ſufficient ſtrength for continuance of the ſiege, took his journey into Piſidia againſt Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made ſhort work. He came upon them unexpected, and ſeiſed on paſſages, which wanted not men, but ſuch a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had been too ſecure before his coming, ſo were they too adventurous, in fighting at the firſt ſight, upon all diſadvantages: and their folly was attended with ſuitable event. Attalus, with many principal Captains was taken; Alcetus fled to the City of Termeſus, where the love of the younger ſort toward him was ſo vehement, that ſtopping their ears againſt all perſwaſions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their lives, and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: for the Governours of the Town having ſecretly compounded with Antigonus, cauſed the young men to ſally out; and uſing the time of advantage, they with their ſervants did ſet upon Alcetus, who unable to reſiſt, ſlew himſelf. His dead body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarouſly torn, was caſt forth without burial. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interred the carkaſs with ſolemn Funerals, having once been minded to ſet on fire their own Town in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchaſed with courteous liberality. But, to make an able General, one virtue, how great ſoever, is inſufficient.

Ptolomy wins Syria and Phœnicia. The death of Antipater.

WHileſt theſe things were in doing, the reſt of the Princes lay idle, rather ſeeking to enjoy their Governments for the preſent, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Ptolomy looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumſtance in the managing. He ſent a Lieutenant with an Army, who quickly took Laomedon priſoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may ſeem) without any great ſtrength of Souldiers, far from Aſſiſtants, and vainly relying upon the Authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with ſeeking to maintain him in his Office.

Antipater was old and ſickly, deſirous of reſt, and therefore contented to let Antigonus purſue the diſpatch of thoſe buſineſſes in Aſia. He had with him Polyſperchon, one of the moſt ancient of Alexanders Captains, that had lately ſuppreſſed a dangerous inſurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had ſtirred in the quarrel of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the firſt, but ſoon loſing all that they had gained, whileſt Antipater was abroad in his Cilician Expedition. In this Polyſperchon, Antipater did repoſe great confidence; ſo far forth, that (ſuſpecting the youth of his own Son Caſſander of inſufficiency in ſo great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his death-bed the Government of Macedon and Greece, together with his office of Protectorſhip. So Antipater died, being fourſcore years old, having alwayes travelled in the great affairs of mighty Princes, with ſuch reputation, that Alexander in all his greatneſs was jealous of him, and the ſucceſſors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him; or were unfortunate in making oppoſitions. In his private qualities, he was a ſubtle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philoſophical behaviour, not unlearned, as having been Scholar to Ariſtotle, and written ſome Hiſtories. He had been much moleſted by Olympias, Alexanders Mother; whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abſtain from coming into Macedonia, or entermedling in matters of State: yea, at his own death he gave eſpecial direction, that no woman ſhould be permitted to deal in the adminiſtration of the Empire. But this precept was ſoon forgotten; and yet, ere long, by ſorrowfull experience approved to have been found and good.

§. XIII.

§. XIII.

Of Polysperchon, who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polysperchon was very skilfull in the Art of War, having long time been Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as he underwent, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his business more formally than wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chief. At the first entrance upon the stage, he called to counsel all his friends, wherein for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queen Olympias was revoked out of Epirus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad should keep greater Armies, than were needful or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Majesty, that might give authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard contain within the limited bounds of duty such as could not by force have been kept in order, being strong, and lying too far off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischiefs lay unregarded in their bosoms. Cassander, the Son of Antipater, was not able to discover that great sufficiency in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discern such odds in the quality of himself and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captain of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seems to imply. He should thereby have been as Camp-master, or Lieutenant general to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himself the better man. Therefore he began to examine his own power, and compare it with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relyed on his Father, were his own assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principal Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principal authority, in those Common-weals, whose forms had been corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains, by whom their faction was up-held; and by whom the rascal multitude, covetous of re-gaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised over the principal Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret love of Queen Eurydice, who had in private rendred him such courtesie, as was due only to her husband. But neither the Queens favour, nor all his other possibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open rebellion; becaus he saw Polysperchon much reverenced among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Country, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, advised with them upon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion. The necessity was apparent of raising an Army, before the business was set on foot; and to do this, opportunity presented him with fair means. Ptolomy had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his Government of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the first news of Antipaters death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himself Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in need of a Civil War; which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed between his Father and them, would avail him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himself on a sudden over the Hellespont, that he might in person advance the business with greater speed. Much perswasion is needless in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coveting nothing more, than to find Polysperchon work, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly press him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomy was ready to declare for them, and urging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repayed him with the same coin, saying, That for his own sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not fail to give him all manner manner of ſuccour. Having thus feaſted one another with words, they were nothing ſlack in preparing the common means, leading to their ſeveral ends.

§. XIV.

The unworthy courſes held by Polyſperchon, for the keeping down of Caſſander.

GReat neceſſity there was of timely proviſion. For, Polyſperchon needed no other inſtructions to inform him of Caſſanders drift, than the news of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready diſpoſition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomy, to the ſtrengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principal hope of Caſſander was repoſed in the confidence of ſuch as ruled in the Græcian Eſtate. Therefore (loving to work circumſpectly) he called another Council, wherein it was concluded, That the popular form of Government ſhould be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garriſons withdrawn; and that all Magiſtrates and principal Men, into whoſe hands Antipater had committed the ſupreme Authority, ſhould forthwith be either ſlain or baniſhed. This was a ſure way to diminiſh the number of Caſſanders friends, and to raiſe up many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was diſcloſed both an unthankful nature in Polyſperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excuſed of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Son went about to diſhonour the Fathers actions, whoſe only bounty had inabled him to do it? Or what could be ſaid in their defence, who ſought to deſtroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greeks were held reſtrained from ſtirring againſt the Macedonians? and in oppoſition to their private enemy, gave the rule of things to baſe Companions, and ſuch as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans body, through ſinews newly iſſuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next neighbour, than by any diſtemper in the contrary hand: ſo in bodies politick, the humours of men ſubdivided in faction, are more inraged by the diſagreeable qualities of ſuch as curb them in their neareſt purpoſes, than they are exaſperated by the general oppoſition of ſuch as are divided from them in the main trunk. Hereby it comes to paſs, that contrary Religions are invited to help againſt Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn in, to a part in civil Wars, and ancient hatred called to counſel againſt injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guilty; ſhe hath taught the arm to offer it ſelf unto manifeſt loſs in defence of the head: They are depraved affections, which render men ſenſible of their own particular, and forgetfull of the more general good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greeks were preſented with a vain ſhew of liberty, ran under the Kings name; but ſo, as one might eaſily diſcern, that Polyſperchon had guided his pen. For the main point was, That they ſhould follow ſuch directions, as Polyſperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the reſt it contained ſuch a deal of kindneſs as proceeding on a ſudden from thoſe who had kept them in hard ſubjection, might well appear to have ſome other root than the pretended good will; and was of it ſelf too baſe and unfit for a King to uſe toward his conquered Subjects, and often-ſubdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great Commotions raiſed in Athens by Polyſperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

NEvertheleſs the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-ſeeming Proclamation, and ſought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garriſon, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleaſing to their haſty deſires.

Nicanor, as a truſty follower of Caſſander, was by him ſhifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captain there before) diſcharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who ſoon after hearing the news of Antipater's death, cried out upon Phocion, ſaying, That he had ſufficient intelligence of that accident, and might, by advertiſing them in due time, have put into their hands a fair opportunity of thruſting out the Macedonians. But theſe exclamations argued no more than a deſire to ſhake off the Macedonian yoke. Far more grievouſly would they have been offended, had they known the inſtructions which Caſſander had given to Nicanor, and his reſolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he ſhould not only retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithſtanding; but that he ſhould find means to thruſt ſome companies companies into Piræus, and fortifie that also, which was the principal Haven, against the high Town. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giving him sufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. They desired him to come unto their Council, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither upon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the War which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise; they urged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to use, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend unto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwayes measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercillus, a Captain following Polysperchon, and then lying near at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athens, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politick dishonesty, did quietly suffer him to depart and save himself.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Piræus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, took it, and intrenched himself therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now master of both. Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Army. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto him; who made fair shews, intending meer mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vain Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queen. Olympias, taking upon her to command, before she durst well adventure to return into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which he held: but he would first consider more of the matter. Polysperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeed) so far from purposing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them have themselves. The commodity of their Havens was such, as he would rather get in to his own hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His Son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made fair shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to intermeddle with the business. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they poured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought every one that best could inveigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedy for the evil threatning them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander devising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much privy conference with him; which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the uproar in the Town was so far increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seek safeguard of their lives by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Country of Phocis, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own deserts (having alwayes been friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Country gave leave) should be enough to get patronage to their innocency. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an evil hour) who promised to himself and them great favour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an unstable man, very earnest in what he took in hand, yet either for want of judgement in following them, or of honesty in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halves, which made him commonly fail of good success. For fear of Cassander he had offered wonderful kindness to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him: out of their love he gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his mind, and seek how to get into his own hands those keys, with which Cassander held them fast lockt up: finding himself disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, he stood wavering between tween the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keep the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well: but the effecting of this began to grow deſperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece, began to caſt their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore he thought it the wiſeſt way to redeem their good opinion, by giving all contentment unto the popular faction, which was then grown to be Maſter of that City. And in good time for this purpoſe were the Athenian Embaſſadors come, treading (as one may ſay) upon Phocions heels, whom they were ſent to accuſe. Theſe had ſolemn audience given to them in the Kings preſence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for oſtentations ſake was glorified with all exterior ſhews of Majeſtie; yet all too little to change Aridæus into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he ſaw others do. For beginning of the buſineſs; Polyſperchon commanded that Dinarchus ſhould be tortured and ſlain. This was enough to teſtifie his hearty affection to the Commonalty of Athens, in that he ſpared not his old acquaintance for their ſake; whoſe Embaſſadors he then bade to ſpeak. When their errand was done, and anſwer to it made by the accuſed, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the reſt were pronounced guilty of Treaſon; but to give ſentnece, and do the execution upon them, was (for honors ſake) referred unto the City of Athens, becauſe they were Burgeſſes. Then were they ſent away to Athens, where the raſcal multitude, not ſuffering them to ſpeak for themſelves, condemned them to dye. So they periſhed being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conſpicuous, made the fortune of the reſt to be of the leſs regard. Five and forty times had he been choſen Governor of the City, never ſuing for the place, but ſent for when he was abſent, ſo well was his integrity known, and ſo highly valued, even of ſuch as were no pretenders to the ſame virtue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein, though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and never unfortunate. Never did the City repent of having followed his counſel: nor any private man of having truſted his word. Philip of Macedon highly eſteemed him; ſo, and much more did Alexander, who (beſides other ſigns of his love) ſent him two hundred talents of ſilver, and offered to beſtow upon him of four Cities in Aſia, any one which he would chuſe. But Phocion refuſed theſe and other gifts, howſoever importunately thruſt upon him; reſting well contented with his honeſt poverty: wherein he lived about fourſcore years, and then was compelled by the unjuſt judgement of wicked men, to drink that poyſon, which by juſt judgement of the righteous God, ſo infected the City of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthy man reſembling the virtue of their Anceſtors.

§. XVI.

Of Polyſperchon his vain Expedition againſt Caſſander.

NOt long after theſe things were done, Caſſander, with ſuch forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which news drew Polyſperchon headlong into Attica, with a great Army, but ſo ill victualled, that he was fain to depart without any thing done. Only he had given ſome impediment to the enemy; who, not contented with defending what he held, began to look out, and made new purchaſes abroad. Finding therefore himſelf funable to drive Caſſander out of Athens, he left his Son Alexander, with ſuch number of men as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withſtand his further incroaching. The greateſt part of his Army he carried into Peloponneſus, to make the Country ſure to himſelf, wherein Caſſander had many friends.

His doings in Peloponneſus were ſuch, as they had been in other parts of Greece. Firſt, he began to fight with Edicts, reſtoring the Democraty, or popular form of Government. He commanded that the principal Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, ſhould be either ſlain, or driven into exile. This Decree took immediate effect in moſt places: the vulgar ſort being very ready to ſeal the Charter of their freedom and authority, with the blood of thoſe who had kept them in ſubjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chief Citizens; and many which wiſhed well to Caſſander, eſpecially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyſperchon meant to inflict an exemplary puniſhment of diſobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thouſand ſerviceable men, wel furniſhed of neceſſaries, and reſolved to endure the worſt. And need there was of ſuch reſolution. For Polyſperchon coming thither with all his power, did ſo much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the ſpace of wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised up an inner wall, to bear out the next assault. The Assailants having failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much pains to clear the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Townsmen perceiving their drift, prepared boards driven thorow with long nails, which they used as gall-throps, bestowing them sleightly covered, with the points upward, in the way by which the beasts were to pass. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certain light-armed men to beat upon their sides with Arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these provisions they made happy use in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnisht for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the business quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, he forsook the siege, with some loss, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Army to lie before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admiral, to Sea, to joyn with Aridæus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the overthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor again, assuring him of the Victory, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be watted over the Streights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting upon Clitus, drave his men, that lay securely on the Land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving, did assail them so lustily, that few or none escaped them.

This loss at Sea, together with his bad success by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good faculty in penning bloody Decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enemy which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Governor of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him, as to an industrious man, and likely to prevail in the end. Thus was the whole Country set in a combustion, uneasie to be quenched; which presented unto Antigonus an opportunity, that he neglected not, of making himself Lord of Asia.

Antigonus seeks to make himself an absolute Lord: and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who disappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

ANtigonus had in Antipaters life-time a firm resolution, to make unto himself the utmost benefit that he might of the Army committed to his charge. And in fair season for advancement of his purposes came the news of Antipaters death; even then, when all the business in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Army remaining, save only the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it self, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutability, to which the present Estate was manifestly subject, would in continuance of some years (which he might abide) work more for him, than his enemies in that space could work against him. His most fear was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men and horses might grow sickly and unserviceable: which made him to practise many devices of keeping them in health and lusty. But when he had continued shut up in this manner about a year, his hopes came to good pass, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himself, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiency of Eumenes, and considering his fidelity shewed unto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designs wherein he doubted not that he should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the the Empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than ever he had been, and the next man to himself, if things fell out as he desired: in regard whereof he required only his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect liberty. Eumenes perusing the form of the oath, did perceive the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keep the Decorum, than upon any loyal intent, the binding words and sum of all were such, as tied him fast only to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of duty, to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it unseemly to become a sworn man to him, with whom he had fought for the mastery; and being assured that his voluntary assistance, which way soever he gave it, would be more acceptable, and far more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore break off the negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of inlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the oath it self, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemn enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying in their allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himself to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as soon as he came down to the Sea-side, to remove some of the Governors of the Provinces, behaving himself according to the authority which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of War. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to justifie his proceeding. For, if Polysperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed unto him, as a Legacy, without consent of the Princes and Souldiers; why might not he himself as well retain the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted unto him for the general good of the State, in presence of the whole Army, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordain what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To give a fair colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had threescore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirty Elephants in a readiness to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Aridæus Governor of Phrygia; who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and sought to have won Cizicus, a fair Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was fain to go away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the Country. Aridæus was so far from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was unable of himself to make long resistance, he took such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like fortune had Clytus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished; and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes having authority from the Court, raiseth great war against Antigonus in defence of the Royal house.

ANtigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the less, was able to have entred Macedon and seized upon the Court; which that he forbare to do, it proceeded (as may seem) from some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousie in Cassander, as fear in Polysperchon, which might have brought them to terms of reconciliation: It would ask more time than he could spare; and the envy which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war upon him in defence of the Royal house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well-affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Army of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, made great haste towards Cilicia, hoping to suppress him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithful to their dead Master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Army, and make war upon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should need. Other letters also there were directed to all the Governors of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captains of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or Silver-shielded bands, commandment was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this Authority was given him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royal blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her, and her Nephew the Son of Alexander; and in the mean time to give her his advice in that which Polysperchon required of her: for she was desirous to return into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawful bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remain in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the war to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seed of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noblemen, in whom Alexanders Mother, Wives and Children, might repose firm confidence, saving only this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, born at Cardia, a City of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his own virtue had made it; his followers obeyed at their own discretion; and compelled he was to travel as far as Persia, to gather together an Army sufficient to resist the enemies that pursued his heels.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridæus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

NOw, forasmuch as in this present War all the Rulers of the Provinces did intermeddle; and great alterations happened, not only in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it self, which brought a new face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royal house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the War it self, to shew briefly how the great Ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawn into those courses, which overthrew most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatness of a few: as likewise to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it self, about the main Controversie of the Title to the Crown, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have been depending.

Aridæus the King, being simple and fearful, did only what he was bidden.

Polysperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the Son of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdom, and become Governor to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queen discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing less than to let her husband serve as a Stale, keeping the Throne warm till another were grown old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turn.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger wherein his family had been through Alexanders malice, together with the indignity offered to himself by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he took in the amorous Queen, made him to resolve, both to suppress the linage which he hated, and to maintain his beloved Mistress, either by supporting her weak Husband, or by taking her to be his own Wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent, who reigned over all, so as they might reign in their several Countries, and establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pitho and Seleuchus lying far off, and being strong, had some good hope to incroach upon their neighbours. Against these, Peucestes, and some others, with much ado hardly made resistance, until such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himself great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queen (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wives. It was thought that she had given poyson to Aridæus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired paired both his body and wits. Now ſhe conſidering, that Eumenes was too full of buſineſs to come home ſo ſoon as ſhe wiſhed that he ſhould; and that Caſſander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the beſt way to joyn with Polyſperchon, and ſet up, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the Son of Roxane, removing Aridæus before Caſſander were able to defend him. To this intent ſhe procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and ſo took her way towards Polyſperchon, who joyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing theſe news, wrote very earneſtly to Caſſander, praying him to ſet aſide all other buſineſs, and come to ſuccour her. She her ſelf by entreaty, gifts, and promiſes, drew to her party as many of the Macedonians as ſhe could, until ſhe thought her own ſide ſtrong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth againſt Olympias, and the Traytor Polyſperchon.

Theſe two Queens met armed, as if the matter ſhould have been determined by their own hands, which ended without any ſtroke ſtricken, by the revolt of thoſe who followed Eurydice. For as ſoon as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Eſtate, and the victorious reigns of her Husband and Son, they refuſed to lift any weapon againſt her. Eurydice finding her ſelf thus forſaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted, and made priſoner with her Husband.

Olympias having obtained this Victory without blood, thought that all things would ſucceed as eaſily, and upon the ſame conſiderations for which they had refuſed to bear Arms againſt her, the Macedonians would not ſtick to maintain her, whatſoever her proceedings were. Having therefore ſhut up Aridæus and his wife in a cloſe room, where they could ſcarce turn round, ſhe fed them thorow a little hole, till after a while it came in her head (for fear leſt the people ſhould have commiſeration of him, that had reigned almoſt ſix years and a half) to put them to death. So ſhe delivered Aridæus to ſome barbarous Thracians; who took away his life by cruel torments: to Eurydice ſhe ſent a ſword, a halter, and a cup of poyſon, willing her to chuſe the inſtrument of her own death, who praying that the like preſents might one day be ſent to Olympias, yielded her neck to the halter, having ſpent her laſt curſes not in vain. Nicanor the Brother of Caſſander, and a hundred the chief of his friends, did Olympias then chuſe out, all whom ſhe commanded to be ſlain. His Brother Iolaus that was already dead and buried, ſhe accuſed of poyſon given to Alexander, and thereupon cauſed his Tomb to be thrown down, and his bones to be ſcattered abroad. The Macedonians wondring at this fury, began to condemn themſelves, and the folly of Polyſperchon, who had, quite contrary to Antipaters charge given on his death-bed, called this outragious woman to the Government of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Caſſander was revenged upon Olympias

†. I.

The great Expedition of Caſſander. Olympias ſhuts her ſelf into Pydna, where Caſſander beſieged her. Æacides King of Epirus, coming to ſuccour Olympias, is forſaken and baniſhed by his own Subjects.

CAſſander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponneſus; whither when all theſe ill tidings were brought to him, he never ſtayed to take the City, nor to give order for the ſtate of things in that Country, (though Alexander the Son of Polyſperchon, were there with an Army) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his aſſociates to look to themſelves as well as they could, till his return; and ſo in all haſte he took his journey towards Macedon, carried headlong with the greedy deſire of juſt revenge. The Ætolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylæ, in favour of the Queen and Polyſperchon, to hinder his paſſage; but he, not willing to miſpend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ſhips as he could, great and ſmall, with which he tranſported his Army into Theſſaly. There he divided his companies, appointing ſome under Callas, a ſubtil Captain, to hold Polyſperchon buſied, who then lay incamped neer to Perhæbia, with the reſt he marched directly againſt Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the reſpect given to her dignity took more care how to appear Majeſtical, than to make her ſelf ſtrong. To this end ſhe made a ſolemn progreſs to Pydna, a Sea-Town, and well fenced, having in her company all the flower of the Court, eſpecially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her young Son Alexander, heir to the great Alexander, by his Grand-mothers deſignment: who during his minority, kept his Soveraign power in her own hands. But all this pomp ſerved to little uſe againſt the violence of the enemy, that ſoon preſented himſelf before the walls; only it fed the beſieged ſieged with a vain hope of ſuccour, that would from all parts arrive, to reſcue perſons of their quality. And hereof there ſoon appeared fair likelihood, which as ſoon vaniſhed, and went away in ſmoak.

For Æacides King of Epirus made great haſte to bring ſuccour to Olympias his Couſin, with whom Deodamia his daughter was alſo ſhut up. Nevertheleſs, his Subjects were nothing forward in this Expedition; but finding certain paſſages taken in the way by Caſſanders men, they called upon him to retire, and quit the enterprize. The Kings importunity urging them to proceed, and the obſtinate refuſal of the Army, brake out at length into ſuch terms, that when he had raged in vain againſt the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forſake his Kingdom, and to wander up and down in foreign Countries a baniſhed man, his people joyning with the enemy, againſt whom he had led them forth to war.

Pydna in the mean time was cloſed up ſtreightly, both by Sea and Land, ſo that neither any could iſſue out of the City, nor any relief be conveyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left; no memorable ſervice being done there, whilſt great actions were managed abroad.

A continuation of Olympias her ſtory. Polyſperchon defeated. Extreme Famine in Pydna. Olympias yields to Caſſander.

NOw, though order of time require it, that we ſhould rehearſe the doings of Eumenes and Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her deſtiny; which grows the faſter upon her, becauſe ſhe may diſcern it coming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the courſe of our narration, by inſerting her Tragedy in the midſt of things not manifeſtly coherent with it; we will here (as elſewhere we have done, and elſewhere muſt) continue to an end one Hiſtory, that we may not be therewith diſtracted, when we ſhall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the beſieged, remaining in Polyſperchon, was in like manner diſappointed as their former truſt had been, which was repoſed in the ſuccours of the Epirots. For Callas, who was ſent againſt him, found the means to corrupt the greateſt part of his Army with mony, leaving him within a little while ſo tenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other buſineſs of war, than a ſwift retrait. When famine had ſo far prevailed in the City, that the horſes were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carkaſſes of their fellows, and ſaw-duſt being given to the Elephants for provender; ſome of the Souldiers obtaining the Queens leave (who could not deny it) others, without asking leave, yielded themſelves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and ſent abroad into the Country. The news of the Queens affairs, diſperſed by theſe men, did ſo affright her well-willers, that ſuch as had reſerved themſelves to the event, came in apace, and ſubmitted to Caſſander. At length, when the mortality was ſo great in the Town, that the living were even poyſoned with the noiſome ſent of the dead; Olympias bethought her ſelf of ſtealing away by Sea in a Galley that ſhe had: wherewith her ſucceſs was as bad as in the reſt. For God had appointed this Town, by her choſen as a place of refuge, to be unto her as a houſe of torment, and a Gaol, out of which ſhe ſhould not be delivered, but unto an evil death. Being therefore utterly broken with miſeries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, unaccuſtomed to ſo wretched a kind of life, ſhe offered compoſition, and with much labour hardly obtained of Caſſander (who having fetcht her Gally out of the Haven, accounted himſelf as good as maſter of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately upon her apprehenſion, Pella, the chief City of the Kingdom, was yielded to Caſſander. Amphipolis did ſtand out: for Ariſtonus (to whom Olympias had given charge of ſuch Forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the ſucceſs of ſome petty ſervices wherein he had prevailed) began to promiſe himſelf great unlikelihods. But Olympias, to win Caſſanders favour, very earneſtly required him upon his faith to her, that he ſhould give it up. He did ſo, and preſently after was killed by his private enemies, that were ſet on by Caſſander, who partly hated him upon old reſpects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to ſeek Innovation.

§. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

WHen Olympias had now heard ſorrowful tidings of all her friends, ſhe her ſelf was called into queſtion, and accuſed in an Aſſembly of the Macedonians, for the murthers (they were ſo ſtiled in her affliction, which which in time of proſperity ſhe called juſtice) by her committed. There was ſhe (being not heard, nor called to ſpeak) condemned to die. The ſute was commenced and proſecuted againſt her, by the kindred of thoſe whom ſhe had ſlain. But it was at Caſſanders inſtigation, who (to haſten the execution) ſent her word, that he would furniſh her with a ſhip, and other neceſſaries, to ſave her ſelf by flight: which when ſhe refuſed, ſaying, that ſhe would plead for her ſelf, and tell her own tale; he diſſembled no longer, but ſent unto her ſuch men, as hated her moſt, who took away her miſerable life. She was Daughter, and Siſter, unto two Kings of Epirus; Wife and Mother unto two the mightieſt Kings, of that, or many other ages; a ſtout Lady, and of unreproveable chaſtity; but her ambition was boundleſs, her hatred unappeaſable, and her fury in revenge moſt unwomanly. Her perverſe conditions made her Husband ſeek other Wives and Concubines, which cauſed her to hate both him, and them. She was thought privy to her Husbands death; after which, very cruelly ſhe ſlew his late Wife Cleopatra, having firſt murthered one of her two children in her arms, and with a beaſtly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a Copper-baſon. For theſe things, her Son Alexander (otherwiſe loving her well) forbade her to meddle in the Government of Macedon. But God, more ſevere unto cruel Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wills, permitted her to live and fulfil the reſt of her wickedneſs (which was his juſtice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppreſſion done by him and others;) after all which, he rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her own head.

§. IV.

Caſſander celebrates the Funeral of Aridæus and Eurydice; and ſeeks to make himſelf King of Macedon.

AFter her death, Caſſander gave honorable burial to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own poſſibilities of greatneſs, he married the Lady Theſſalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the Daughter of King Philip, by another of his Wives; that by her he might have ſome title to the Crown. For the ſame end he committed Roxane, and her young Son to cloſe Priſon, removing thereby ſome part of his impediment. And, the better to encreaſe his fame, and purchaſe love, built a City, called by his own name Caſſandria, that ſoon grew to be very great and powerful. He re-edified likewiſe Thebes in Greece, and reſtored it unto the old Inhabitants, after it had lain twenty years waſte, being utterly razed by Alexander. By theſe means, eſpecially by the reſtauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew ſo ſtrong, that few remained enemies unto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could reſiſt him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will return to them, who contended in Aſia, for leſs titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IV.

Of the great Lordſhip which Antigonus got in Aſia.

§. I.

The Journey of Eumenes into Perſia. His wiſe dealing with thoſe that joyned with him.

EUmenes, having joyned unto his company the Argyraſpides, made haſte into the Eaſtern parts, to take poſſeſſion of thoſe Countries, according to his Commiſſion, and ſtrengthen himſelf againſt Antigonus. He took his journey through Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaim thoſe Provinces, uſurped the reſt of Syria (as hath been ſhewed) by Ptolomy, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haſte of his paſſing forward was too great, his Army too little, and the readineſs of the people, to return their due obedience, none at all. Beſides all which Impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the leſs effectual. The Captains of the Agyraſpides were ſo froward, froward, that they scorned to repair to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that they might more easily have dealt with open Traytors. It was not expedient, that he, being General, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keep them in order by compulsion. Therefore he feigned, that Alexander had appointed unto him, in a dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pavilion, wherein an empty throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present at their consultations. Thus he freed himself from their vain pride; but of their faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Ptolomy requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the Kings Warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings Authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to rely upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affairs required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand through the Country of Babylon; in such wise that Seleucus, having in vain assayed to hinder him, by opening the sluces of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Eastern Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences between Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority grew very hot among them, every one finding matter enough to feed his own humour of self-worthiness. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet; the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving advice, and best able to reward, by means of the authority given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these means he won to himself many of those, who had most power to do good or hurt.

How Antigonus, coming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with loss.

ANtigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soon as he had made himself strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battel. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, and was retired back toward Persia, keeping the River of Tigris between him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good espial kept upon Antigonus, to observe which way he took. Before he came to Tigris it self, he was to pass over Coprates, a great River, and not foordable, which he sought to do by small Vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, and four thousand foot, to see their demeanor: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drave them headlong back into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except four thousand that yielded themselves prisoners in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This loss made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Country in the Dog-days, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as far as into Media. So he took Python with him; (leaving Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to go the neerest way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his Troops that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes *his cunning. A Battel betwee*n him and Antigonus.

AFter his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their business. Fain he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behind him; to which also the Captains of the Argyraspides or Silver-shields, were very inclinable, as desiring to draw near to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their own particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. These carried it; for the Army was not strong enough to divide it self into parts.

When

When they came into Persia, Peucestes ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Souldiers love to himself. Eumenes perceiving whereunto those doings tended, suffered him a while to keep good chear, till the time of War drew near. Then did he feign an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Governor of Armenia, to Peucestes himself: The purport whereof was; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent over a great Army under Polysperchon, to joyn with Eumenes. These news, as they filled the Camp with vain joy, so they wrought in all mens minds a great willingness to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being far the most sufficient Commander, as they found soon after. For when Antigonus, coming out of Media, drew near unto them, Eumenes, by some mischance was fallen sick, and fain to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have been forced to take battel in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captains were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the sudden did cast his men into so good form, that Antigonus, perceiving him afar off, could not refrain from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captains, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the trial of a battel. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The battel was fought with variable success, and great loss on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was uncertain. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye far from their carriages: by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies, which was accounted the sign of victory; for he buried his own, and gave leave to his enemies craving it, to do the like. But a greater sign of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not only buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Country round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steal away by night, and return into Media, from whence he came.

§. IV.

Of divers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

THus did the War continue doubtful, and was protracted to a greater length, each part having stout Souldiers, and skilful Generals: but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindred by the equal authority of many, from pursuing all advantanges to the best, Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repair himself he could find no way safer, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far asunder, so that if he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distress. Between him and them, the way was not long, being only nine days journey, but very bad, through a rough dry wilderness, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring twenty five days journey, he forsook; partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come undiscovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbade unto his men the use of fire by night, because he would not have them discryed afar off. This commandment had been well observed four or five days, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being near to their ways end. The light of these fires gave notice of their coming; which being reported to Peucestes, and other Captains, they were so astonished with the sudden danger, that in all haste they betook themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the news, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could scarce believe him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He took with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith he occupied certain tops of mountains, looking toward the Camp of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient ground to encamp upon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Army had been present. This was a sorrowful spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himself prevented of his purpose; and began to fear lest he should be compelled to fight, whilest his men were tired with a long and painful journey. Therefore he reſolved to turn aſide, and take the way to ſuch places, as might better ſerve to refreſh his Army. This he did with great care and circumſpection, at the firſt, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while, conſidering that no enemy ſtirred about him, he began to pauſe, and think in himſelf, that ſomewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he cauſed ſome Inhabitants of that deſart to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had ſeen no other Army than his thereabout, but only a few men that kept fires on the hill-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to find that he had been ſo deluded. Therefore he went againſt theſe Troops with great fury, meaning to take ſharp vengeance on them, for having ſo deceived him. But by this time, ſufficient ſtrength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much buſineſs, and long ſtay. All the Army was come, ſave only Eudamus, Captain of the Elephants, who, beſides thoſe beaſts, had no more than four hundred horſemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this ſupply coming to his enemies, ſent above two thouſand horſe, and all his light-armed foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was fain to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and ſo to defend himſelf as well as he could; for his horſe-men, overlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the ſpur. Neither knew they, who ſate upon the Elephants, which way to turn them, for on all ſides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave Troops of horſe and foot, that came unexpected to the reſcue; and charging the Aſſailants upon the back, drave them to ſeek their own ſafety by ſpeedy flight. Theſe were ſent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his Adverſary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fitteſt for him to do: and therefore, playing both games himſelf, provided the remedy.

§. V.

The conſpiracy of Peuceſtes and others, againſt Eumenes his life.

BY theſe means Eumenes won great honor, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a moſt expert General, and well worthy of the chief command. But Peuceſtes, and the other Captains, guilty of their own much inſufficiency, were ſo tranſported with Envy, that they could no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a neceſſary point, how they might find means to murther him.

Surely, it is great injuſtice to impute the miſchief contrived againſt worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or ſome other ill deſerving: For, though it often happen, that ſmall vices do ſerve to counterpoize great vertues; (the ſenſe of evil being more quick and laſting than of good) yet he ſhall bewray a very fooliſh malice, that, wanting other teſtimony, will think it a part of wiſdom, to find good reaſon of the evils done to vertuous men, which oftentimes have no other cauſe than vertue it ſelf. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of ſingular courteſie, of a very ſweet converſation among his friends, and careful by all gentle means to win their love, that ſeemed to bear him any ſecret ill affection. It was his meer vertue that overthrew him, which even they that ſought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he ſhould not be ſlain, before the battel were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confeſſed that it ſtood beſt with their ſafety, to be governed by his direction. Of this treaſon he was quickly advertiſed by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleaſures, and by ſome others of whom he uſed to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they ſhould be careful of his good, for fear of loſing their own. Conſidering therefore, and diſcourſing with himſelf of the villany intended againſt him, he made his laſt Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of ſecret: which done, he revolved many things in his mind; being doubtful what courſe he were beſt to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire ſtood ill affected to the Royal blood, excepting thoſe which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time ſtood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to ſeek their help, that needed his. To make his own peace with Antigonus, had been againſt his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cauſe alſo it may be thought, that he forbare either to loſe the battel willingly, or to fly into Cappadocia, and make ſhift for himſelf among his old friends. At length he reſolved to do his beſt againſt the common enemy, and afterwards to look to himſelf as well as he might.

§. VI.

The laſt battel between Antigonus and Eumenes.

THe Souldiers, eſpecially thoſe old bands of the Silver-ſhields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cauſe, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but only to bring them in the field, and ſet them in array; for the reſt, they alone would take ſufficient order. The like alacrity was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chief Commanders were ſo miſchievouſly bent againſt him, that they could not endure to think of being beholding to him for the victory. Yet he ordered the battel ſo well, that, without their own great fault, they could hardly fail of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horſeman from the ſide of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voyce unto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickedneſs in fighting againſt their own Fathers, would now be puniſhed, as it well deſerved. This was not ſpoken in vain, For the Silver-ſhields were men of threeſcore or ſeventy years old, and ſtrengthened more by continual exerciſe, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having paſſed through greater dangers, than any like to be preſented in that fight.

Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to try their laſt hope with theſe reſolute warriors, the moſt Ancient and beſt regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very penſive, and advanced heavily, ſuſpecting their own cauſe, and fearing that the threatnings uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now again far the ſtronger in horſe, which gave him cauſe of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plain levelled field. Placing therefore himſelf and his ſon Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Python, he did ſet forward couragiouſly againſt the Enemies, that were ready to give him a ſharp entertainment.

Eumenes took unto him Peuceſtes, with the reſt of the Lords, and ſtood in the left wing of his battel, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to prevent the Traytors, his Companions, of all means to make head againſt him on the ſudden; and (withal) to give proof of his own valour, which perhaps he ſhould no more do, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, oppoſite unto Python, he beſtowed the weakeſt of his Horſe and Elephants, under one Philip, an honeſt man, and (which was enough at ſuch a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reaſonable retrait, expecting the event of the other ſide.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himſelf maſter of all; Eumenes, to die an honorable death, or to win ſuch a victory upon his open enemies, as might give him leiſure and opportunity to deal with his falſe friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being, even in their own opinions, far inferior to thoſe whom they muſt encounter, were at the firſt brunt preſently defeated by the Silver-ſhields, who ſlew above five thouſand of them, loſing of their own not one man. But in Horſe, Eumenes was ſo over-matched, that he could not repel Antigonus, who preſſed him very hard, but was fain to ſtand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought ſo well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, until ſuch time as Peuceſtes, with one thouſand five hundred Horſe, withdrew himſelf out of the battel, leaving his companions fighting to defend his back.

Then did Eumenes deſperately ruſh amongſt his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonus himſelf. And though he failed of his purpoſe; yet with great ſlaughter he did ſo beat upon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in ſuſpence, uncertain which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a ſlight ſandy mould, through the trampling of horſes, men and Elephants, did caſt up ſuch a cloud of duſt, as hindred the proſpect, ſo that no man could ſee what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, diſpatched away ſome companies of Horſe, that paſſed undiſcovered beyond Eumenes his battels, and came to his carriages, which lay about half a mile from the place of fight, ſlenderly guarded (for that the whole body of the Army lay between them and danger) and therefore eaſily taken. Had Peuceſtes retired himſelf no further than unto the carriages, he might not only have defended them, but peradventure have ſurprized thoſe which came to ſurprize them, and ſo have done as good a piece of ſervice as a better man. But he was gotten ſomewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event; and Eumenes was ſo over-laboured both in body and mind, that he could not poſſibly give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It hapned ſo, that the Elephants meeting together, thoſe of Antigonus, had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himſelf every way overcharged, began to give back, and withdrew himſelf and his companies in good order, to the other ſide of the battel, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loſs. The Antigonians had felt ſo much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wiſhed not to ſee him come again; as fain he would have done.

The loſs of the carriages was reported unto him, as ſoon as he had any leiſure to hear how things went: whereupon he preſently ordered his men for a freſh charge, and ſent for Peuceſtes that was not far off, requeſting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he truſted, not only to recover their own goods, but to enrich themſelves with the ſpoils of the enemies. Peuceſtes not only refuſed to joyn with him, but immediately withdrew himſelf into a ſafer place, where he might be further from ſuch dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were deſirous to return into their Camps. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing ſomewhat more, and therefore taking halt his horſemen, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other half he committed to Python, willing him to ſet upon the Silver-ſhields in their retrait; which yet he forbare to do, becauſe it appeared too full of danger. So the battel ended; wherein Antigonus had not ſo much the better in horſe, as the worſe in foot: but the ſpoil which he got, by ſurprizing his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other loſſes.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and ſlain.

EUmenes, coming into his Camp, and finding the Silver-ſhields extremely diſcontented with their misfortune, began to cheer them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanor that day had ſo cruſhed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much leſs able to draw their Carts after him, through that great wilderneſs, over the high mountains.

But theſe perſwaſions availed nothing. Peuceſtes was gone; the other Captains would needs return into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no deſire either to fly or to fight, but only to recover their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captains of the Silver-ſhields (who had in former times readily conſented unto trayterous motions, in hope of gain, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought a fit occaſion of making himſelf great, and winning the love of thoſe bands, dealt ſecretly with Antigonus, requeſting him to reſtore unto thoſe old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the only reward of their ſervices, in the Wars of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a ſubtile man, knew very well, that they which requeſted more than they had reaſon to expect, would alſo with little entreaty, perform a great deal more than they promiſed; and therefore he lovingly entertained the meſſengers, filling them with hopes of far greater matters than they deſired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were ſeduced to make War againſt him. This anſwer pleaſed them ſo well, that they forthwith deviſed how to deliver him alive. Wherefore coming about him, as at other times, to do their duty, and pretending more joy of their victory, than ſorrow of their loſs, which they ſaid they would redeem by another fight; in the midſt of this goodly talk, they leapt upon him, caught hold of his ſword, and bound him faſt. So they haled him away; and, ſtopping their ears againſt all perſwaſions, would not yield ſo far as to looſen one of his hands, and let him kill himſelf, but brought him alive (that was their own General, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Camp of their enemies.

The preſs of men, running out of the Camp to ſee him, was ſo great, that Antigonus was fain to ſend a guard of Horſemen and Elephants, to keep him from being ſmothered; whom he could not ſuddenly reſolve either to kill or ſave. Very few they were that ſued for his life, but of theſe, Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus was one, the reſt were deſirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were ſaved, he would ſoon be the chief in reputation, for his great ability. So, after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded that it was the ſafeſt way to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps becauſe he would keep it a while in his own power, to reverſe the ſentence, as deſiring, if it might be, to have him live his friend) haſte of other buſineſs made him do it by the ſword.

To this end came all the travels of that worthy General Eumenes; who had with great wiſdom, fidelity and patience, laboured in vain to uphold the family which God had purpoſed to caſt down. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his Government of himſelf, in all her changes. Adverſity never leſſened his courage, nor proſperity his circumſpection. But all his virtue, induſtry and wit, were caſt away, in leading an Army, without full power, to keep it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill anſwered by Gaſper de Coligny, Admiral of France in our days, to one that foretold his death, which enſued ſoon after in the maſſacre of Paris: That rather than to lead again an Army of Voluntaries, he would dye a thouſand times.

Antigonus himſelf gave to the body of Eumenes Honourable Funerals; and rewarded the Treaſon, wrought againſt him, with deſerved vengeance. One chief Captain of the Silver-ſhields he burnt alive; many of the other Captains he ſlew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-ſhields, that had betrayed ſo worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that ſhould carry them into far Countries, under pretence of Wars; but with a privy charge, to conſume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them return alive unto his friends and kindred, or ſo much as once behold the Seas that beat upon the ſhores of Greece and Macedon.

How Antigonus ſlew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governors of Provinces, and made himſelf Lord of Perſia, carrying away Peuceſtes.

THe two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they ſpent the reſt of the Winter: the common Souldier idly; the principal men intentively bent unto the buſineſs enſuing. Python began to conſider his own deſervings; for the whole War had been chiefly maintained by the ſtrength, and riches of this Province. Beſides, he thought himſelf as good a man as Antigonus, unleſs it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged eaſie to be purchaſed with gifts, and therefore ſpared not to aſſay them with great liberality. But in following this courſe he was driven by neceſſity to truſt many, of whom he ſtumbled upon ſome, that were unſecret, and others, bearing him no ſincere affection. Thus was his purpoſe diſcovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) diſſembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of diſſention between him, and his honorable friend, unto whom he meant to commit the Government of all thoſe Countries: his own buſineſs calling him into the lower Aſia. Theſe reports coming daily to his ears, did finely delude Python. By his greatneſs with Alexander; his authority in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governor; and the love of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was ſtrong enough to maintain, even an offenſive War. But what need had he to uſe the ſword, when he was likely without contention, to obtain more than his own asking? Therefore he came as ſoon as he was ſent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing leſs than to yield to any ſuch diviſion. As ſoon as he came, he was taken, and accuſed, condemned to dye, and ſlain out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward reſtrained by any conſideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that ſtood in his way: but ſwam careleſly thorow the blood, wherein at the firſt he doubtfully waded.

When this buſineſs was ended, he appointed a new Governor in Media, to order the Province, and a Captain, to ſuppreſs all commotions: thinking belike that the power and authority, ſo divided, would hardly agree in one againſt him, from whom both were derived.

After this he marched into Perſia, where he was entertained as abſolute Lord of Aſia. There began he to ſhew how well he underſtood his own mightineſs. For he placed and diſplaced at his own pleaſure, Governors in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his own creatures, except ſuch as lay too far off to be diſlodged eaſily.

Peuceſtes, who ruled in Perſia, thought with good cheer to redeem old offences; but was deceived, having to do with one that could not be taken with ſuch baits: he was carried away, and feaſted with goodly words of promiſe, that never after took effect. Thus he, that envied the virtue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vain) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a moſt contemptible life, till he died obſcurely a man forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this Visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, and now gave proof of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captain of the Caste of Susa to meet him on the way, rendring unto him that strong Piece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly believe it; but used him with excessive kindness, for fear so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made up five and twenty thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himself a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happiness. But large dominion was the mark at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Soveraign Lord. Coming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus, with all possible demonstration of love, and honored with presents beseeming the Majestie of a King. All this he accepted with great gravity, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreasonable; saying, That it was not needful for him to render unto any man an account of that Province, which was given unto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficeth, that Antigonus was powerful; who urged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moved Antigonus to press him thus, but only the desire to pick matter of quarrel against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue, as Python and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty horse, he conveyed himself away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from such a man as went about to oppress all, that in former times had been his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yielded unto him without battel, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldæans brought a strange Prophecy to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himself; and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, win all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battel. Easie believers may give credit to this tale. Had it been true, methinks Antigonus rather should have hanged those Chaldæans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the Destinies preserved for so great purposes. When he had settled things at Babylon, he took his journey into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took up ten thousand Talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yearly in-come to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great War between Alexanders Captains: and how they assumed the Name and State of Kings.

§. I.

The Combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their demands, and his Answer.

THis great riches, and the rest of his Power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomy, Cassander and Lysimachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his own accord he seemed like to yield unto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient ſufficient cauſe of miſtruſt. Therefore he ſent Embaſſadors to them ſeverally, entreating them to continue firm in their love toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold anſwers which they made, occaſioned his haſty preparation againſt the moſt forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good Army ſhould prevail more than a fair meſſage. Therefore, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would permit, he took the way toward Syria, and was encountred by Embaſſage from them all. Theſe told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victory obtained againſt Eumenes their common enemy, and the honor that he had thereby gotten. In which War, foraſmuch as they being his Confederates, muſt have indured great loſs, with hazard of their whole Eſtates, if the contrary faction had prevailed; they held it very juſt, that all ſhould be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they deſired him, that making between them all an equal diviſion of the treaſures that were in his hands (a thing eaſie to be done) he would alſo take ſome convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchaſes. This might beſt be to every ones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Caſſander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Helleſpont, to Lyſimachus: for whereas his own Dominions were ſo much extended Eaſtward by his late victory, he might well ſpare ſome of thoſe Weſtern Provinces, to thoſe that were ſeated in the Weſt. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave any new addition, but reſt contented within his own Territories. Provided always, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late War, might be reſtored to his own, out of which he had been driven ſo injuriouſly, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly conſent unto their demands, which otherwiſe they muſt labour to obtain with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many loſſes received, he ſhould yet be able to redeem Peace whenſoever he liſted, with theſe, or perhaps with eaſier conditions. Neither was he ſo weak, to give away quietly any part of his ſtrength into the hands of ſuch bad friends, for fear only, leſt it ſhould be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he ſhould be able to find them work, more than enough to defend their own. Therefore he roundly anſwered the Embaſſadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens help had obtained. Though indeed they had already ſufficiently gained by him, if they could ſee it, having by his means kept their Government, whereof they were like to be diſpoſſeſſed by Polyſperchon, and the counſel of eſtate in Macedon. But what marvel was it, if they conſidered not how he had ſaved them, ſeeing one of them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a fugitive, and begging ſuccour, he was by his meer bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Caſſander did not (ſaid he) in thoſe days command me to ſurrender Provinces, and give him his equal ſhare of my treaſures; but (for his Fathers ſake) deſired me to pity him, and help him againſt his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now preſumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, How can he complain of wrong, that durſt not ſtay to plead his right? I did uſe him well, but his conſcience told him that he had deſerved ill; elſe he would not have fled. Let them that ſo curiouſly ſearch into my doings, conſider well their own, which ſome of them can hardly juſtifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deal with others, if they continue to provoke me.

§. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the Wars.

WHen the Embaſſadors were diſmiſſed with this anſwer, nothing was thought upon but War. Antigonus perceiving that he ſhould be invaded from Europe, as ſoon as he was entred into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coaſt, and hinder Caſſander from landing in Aſia: giveing him alſo charge, to drive out of Cappadocia, ſome that were already ſent over to moleſt him. Likewiſe he diſpatched Meſſengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unfurniſhed of mony; to draw friends to his ſide, and raiſe up troubles to his enemies. Eſpecially, he laboured to make himſelf the ſtrongeſt by Sea; to which purpoſe he rather haſtened, than foreſlowed his journey into Syria, that he might get poſſeſſion of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Navy. Therefore, having erected Beacons, and laid poſt-horſes throughout all Aſia, to give ſwift advertiſement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held againſt him him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honored of the people as their natural Lord: his other Provinces be kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to contain the people within obedience, than to confront a foreign enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on work in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a year and three months; not idly. For he took Joppe and Gaza, which were yielded unto his discretion, and well used. The strong City of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it self upon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Arms; which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not asleep, whilst these things were in doing, though he kept himself within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behoved him to do. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plain field, but likely they were to encrease, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chief command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred sail along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords: of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomy, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharp steel.

The same commodity of aid by Sea, encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the Son of Antipater, howsoever by the painful and Learned Writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is, by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and busily imploy in their quarrel all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himself into dangerous War, chusing rather to undergo trouble at hand, than to fall under certain ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

§. III.

How each party sought to win the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the Son of Polysperchon revolteth from Antigonus, who had set him up.

IN the mean season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure unto them the people of Greece, whose aid, which way soever inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedæmonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thousand; and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowse himself again, and taking upon him the title of Captain of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kind. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his own Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, Mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had shut up in close prison the poor Lady Roxane, Alexanders Wife, and his Son begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himself King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Thessalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match unfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to joyn with him in marriage. That in meer despite of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Cassandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was leveled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a Decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute liberty the Lady Roxane, and her Son; and should yield obedience to the Lord Lieutenant General of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himself was understood) or else should be reputed a Traytor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedom: this he did, not because he was careful of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was was perſwaded, that not only the Greeks would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Caſſander, but that the rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto ſuſpected him as a man regardful of nothing but his own benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the moſt faithful of all others to the Royal blood. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wiſe to be deceived with vain ſhews. His undertaking for the liberty of the Greeks was more effectual, and got eaſie belief, in regard of his preſent hatred to Caſſander. Yet herein alſo Ptolomy ſtrove to be as earneſt as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himſelf that valiant Nation, which afforded men far more ſerviceable in War, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point at which both ſides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all ſure, deceived himſelf, not without great coſt. For he gave to Alexander the Son of Polyſperchon five hundred talents, willing him to ſet the War on foot in Peloponneſus, whereby it might appear, that on his ſide was meant nothing elſe, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponneſus, Caſſanders men had with much blood-ſhed, grievouſly afflicted the contrary faction, and he himſelf perceiving, that they were more eaſily ſpoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the beſt way to make what uſe he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furniſhed with plenty of gold, wherewith he was able not only to win the doubtful, but to corrupt ſuch as might ſeem beſt aſſured; he thought it a part of wiſdom, to ſurrender upon fair conditions, that which he could not aſſure himſelf to hold any long time by force. Therefore he ſent one to deal with Alexander about the matters in controverſie; telling him, that Antigonus was very skilful in ſetting men together by the ears, not caring who prevailed, but only deſiring to have them weary themſelves, whilſt he was buſied elſewhere; that ſo at length he might find opportunity to ſet upon the ſtronger. If therefore Alexander were ſo wiſe, as to keep in his purſe the five hundred talents which he had, and, without ſtroke ſtricken, to receive the whole Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, it ſhould be freely put into his hands by Caſſander; provided, that he ſhould from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a ſure and faithful league with Ptolomy, Caſſander, and the reſt of the Confederates. Otherwiſe he might well perſwade himſelf, that the Country which his Father could not keep, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, ſhould not in haſte be won by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, ſo ſtiling himſelf, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus ſince the beginning of theſe wars; among whoſe followers it was not hard to diſcover the intent (which he did not carry very ſecret) of making himſelf abſolute Lord of all. Therefore he was ſoon entreated to accept ſo good an offer; and did not ſtick to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and ſubject unto no mans control.

Howbeit, this his honor continued not long, ere he loſt both it and his life together, by treaſon of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themſelves free, were ſoon after vanquiſhed in battel by Crateſipolis, Alexanders Wife, a diſcreet and valiant Lady. She in revenge of her Husbands death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight; and having by ſeverity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army in good order, and governed thoſe places that ſhe held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IV.

The Ætolians riſe againſt Caſſander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A Fleet, and Land-Army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what terms the War ſtood at this time. Antigonus draws nearer to Greece.

ANtigonus, when he found, that with ſo much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raiſe troubles to Caſſander, and his other Adverſaries in Greece, by ſtirring up the Ætolians againſt them: Likewiſe he laboured to win to his party the Iſlands in the Greek Seas, by whoſe aſſiſtance he might be the better able to deal with Ptolomy, that greatly prevailed by reaſon of his ſtrong Fleet. But neither of theſe attempts had the ſucceſs which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, and alwayes envying the greatneſs of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but ſo, that commonly their gains equalled not their loſſes. Caſſander wan ſome of their own Country, fortified the Acarnanians againſt them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquiſhed in battel, to forſake their ſide, and bind himſelf, ſelf to bear no Arms againſt Caſſanders friends.

On the other ſide, as many petty Iſlands were drawn to joyn with Antigonus; ſo the Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admiral to Antigonus, paſſing along the coaſt of Aſia towards Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Perilaus marching on the ſhore for mutual aſſiſtance, was quite overthrown by Ptolomies Navy. Polyclytus, who in Ptolomies behalf had been ſent into Peloponneſus againſt Alexander, finding no need of his ſervice in that Country, becauſe Alexander was come over to their ſide, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the courſe which theſe Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly ſurprized. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambuſh, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken priſoner, with many of his men, and many were ſlain, making little reſiſtance. Theodatus the Admiral perceiving this, made all haſte to help his fellows that were on Land; but whilſt he with all his Fleet were intentive only to that buſineſs, Polyclytus appeared at their backs; who as ſoon as he perceived their diſorder, haſtened about the Cape, and charging them behind, ſuffered not one of them to eſcape him. Theſe ill tidings cauſed Antigonus to deal with Ptolomy about ſome compoſition. Firſt, he ſent Embaſſadors; afterwards they met in perſon. But Antigonus would not yield unto the demands of Ptolomy: ſo the parley was vain.

Hitherto each part ſeemed to have indifferently ſped in the War, and thereby to have equal cauſe of hope and fear. This late Victory, with the good ſucceſs of his affairs in Cyprus, did ſeem to make amends to Ptolomy for his loſſes in Syria. Likewiſe the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the confederacy made between the Ætolians and him; as alſo thoſe petty skirmiſhes, that had been in Aſia the leſs, to Antigonus his advantage, were ſufficiently recompenced by others of like regard, but adverſe to him, and by the troubles brought upon his eſtates in thoſe parts by the two Caſſanders.

Contrariwiſe, Antigonus valued the loſs of his men, money and ſhips, no otherwiſe than as the pairing of his nails, that were left long enough, and would eaſily grow again, but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate; as if thereby he had fed upon a limb of Ptolomy his enemy, and ſtrengthened the body of his own Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto ſufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occaſion ſhould direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no money.

That which moſt moleſted him, was the attempts of his enemies upon Aſia the leſs; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cauſe to fear, leſt the people being tied unto him by no bond of allegiance, might upon ſmall occaſion revolt from him, to men of as honorable reputation as he himſelf. To prevent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in perſon, where his affairs did ſeem to proſper the worſe, by reaſon of his abſence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria, under his Son Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captains, as Aſſiſtants, or rather as Directors: the reſt he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

How Lyſimachus and Caſſander vanquiſhed ſome enemies, raiſed againſt them by Antigonus. The good ſucceſs of Antigonus in Aſia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities againſt Caſſander.

THe coming of Antigonus into thoſe parts, wrought a great alteration in the proceſs of his buſineſs thereabouts. For his enemies had ſhort leiſure to think upon moleſting him in Aſia: they themſelves were held over-hardly to their own work on Europe ſide. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, joyning with ſome Towns that rebelled againſt Lyſimachus, brought alſo the bordering Scythians into the quarrel. All theſe relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with money and other aid. The Ætolians likewiſe took courage, and roſe againſt Caſſander, having Æacides, lately reſtored to the Kingdom of Epirus, their Aſſiſtant. But Lyſimachus gave unto his Rebels no time to confirm themſelves. He ſuddenly preſented himſelf before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by fear to return unto their former duty. He fought a battel with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and drave them out of the Country. Finally, he overcame Seuthes; and following the heat of his Victory, ſlew Pauſanias in Battel, whom Antigonus had ſent over with an Army; and all his men he did either put to ranſome, or fill up with them his own Bands. The like ſucceſs had

Philip,

Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For he wasted their Country; fought with the Epirotes, that came to help them: and after the victory, fought again with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, and, killing Æacides that unfortunate King. Finally, he drave the Ætolians out of most of their Countrey, and forced them to seek their safety among the wild Mountains. Of the Epirotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principal Authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his Adversaries with painful travel; after which they remained only savers. Antigonus himself at fair leisure wan all Caria the whilst, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty upon all the Cities he took out of Cassanders hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Eubœa, and many places of the firm Land, were by those means won to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to do or suffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readiness, to give them the liberty in deed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would fain have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would pass over into Macedon: by which terror he forced Cassander to repair thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Towns of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any foreign succour appeared. The aid which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Country; drave his Garrisons out of divers Cities; forced the Governor of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wan the Citadel of Thebes, and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before been raised out of her old ruines by the meer power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the love of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thank the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to look forward upon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miserable nullity, that held them uncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great Battel at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus wan, against Demetrius the Son of Antigonus.

AS the presence or neerness of Antigonus gave life to his affairs in the lower Asia and Greece; so the designs of his enemies, taking advantage at his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Eastern parts, wherewith in the year preceeding he had over-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wavered between contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his own person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governour of the whole Country. With the same Fleet he ran along the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoils of which he enriched his followers, and returned loaden to Cyprus. Demetrius the Son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his horses, and light-armed foot with him, because the business required expedition. But in vain did he tire himself and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deep, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many days, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanity of this expedition was the success. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightned his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return upon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a Royal Army, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was fain to chuse out of uncertainties the most likelihood, and return the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for service in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had ſcarce refreſhed his men and horſes in Syria, when the news arrived of Ptolomies coming with a puiſſant Army, to give him battel. Hereupon he called to counſel his principal friends, who adviſed him to give way to the time, and expect ſome better opportunity in the future, being a young man, and weakly furniſhed with means to reſiſt ſuch ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomy and Seleucus. This counſel ſeemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of thoſe aged men that gave it, than from any neceſſity growing out of the preſent buſineſs. For Demetrius conſidering himſelf to be the Son of Antigonus, and now General of his Fathers Army, thought his own title weighty enough to be laid in ballance againſt the bare names of thoſe two great Commanders. Neither found he much reaſon that ſhould move him to diſtruſt his forces, as inſufficient. His men were better exerciſed than the enemies, and promiſed as much as could be required. Therefore perſwading himſelf, that ſuch odds of number, and of great fame, would rather ſerve to adorn his victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he reſolved to put the matter to tryal, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Souldiers with hope of ſpoil and rewards, he abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpoſe to encounter them, as ſoon as they had finiſhed their wearisome journey over the Deſarts of Arabia.

Ptolomy and Seleucus iſſuing out of ſo rich a Province as Egypt, came ſo well provided of all neceſſaries, that their Army felt not any great grievance of the evil way, when battel was preſented them, which confidently they undertook. In all things elſe they had the odds of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how to deal with thoſe Beaſts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kind of Paliſado, faſtened ſtrongly together with chains, and ſharpened in ſuch a manner, that the Elephants could not ſeek to break upon it, without receiving much hurt. The reſt of their forces (which (beſides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate ſervices, by them performed that year, whilſt the enemies had wearied themſelves, either with vain journeys, or long and dulling expectation) they diſpoſed in ſuch order, as beſt anſwered to the form wherein Demetrius was embattelled. The fight began, and was maintained with equal courage, for a long time, each part ſtriving more to win honor, than to ſatisfie any other paſſion, as having little cauſe of hatred, or revenge. But after ſome continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon no neceſſity would needs fight a battel with diſadvantage, began to appear by his loſſes. He had committed himſelf to Fortune, having more to loſe by her than he could get: but in this fight ſhe was idle, and left all to be decided by ſtrong hands; unleſs it may be ſaid, that the terror brought upon his men, by the loſs of his Elephants, was bad luck. Thoſe beaſts were in that kind of War hardly to be reſiſted on plain ground; and therefore at the firſt they made great ſpoil amongſt Ptolomy's men. Afterward ſeeking to break thorow the Paliſado, they were ſorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This diſaſter cauſed the horſemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all muſt lye upon their hands, who were ill able to make their own places good, they began to ſhrink, and many of them to provide for their ſafety by timely flight, which example the reſt quickly followed. When Demetrius had ſtroven ſo long in vain to make his men abide, that he himſelf was likely to be loſt; he was fain to give place to the ſtronger, making a violent retrait as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of Battel. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither ſome of his company turned aſide, hoping to ſave ſuch goods, as in haſte they could pack up. This fooliſh covetouſneſs was their deſtruction, and the loſs of the Town. For, whilſt they, forgetful of the danger, had filled the ſtreets with ſumpter-horſes, and cloyed up the gates, thronging, ſome to get in and fetch; others, to carry out what they had already loaden, Ptolomy's Army brake in without reſiſtance, taking them with their goods and the City altogether.

This Victory reſtored unto Ptolomy the beſt part of Syria, a Province more eaſie in thoſe times to get, than to keep; and opened the way unto all the greatneſs of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered reſiſtance. In Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, ſome Towns held out a while, but were ſoon taken in by Ptolomy. Among theſe were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sydon; of which Sidon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garriſon, falling to mutiny againſt their Captain, who truſting to the ſtrength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honorably entertained in reſpect of his fidelity.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himſelf Lord of many Countries in the higheſt Aſia. The Æra of the Kingdom of the Greeks, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHile Ptolomy followed his buſineſs with ſuch proſperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to try his own fortune; which he found ſo favourable, that recovering firſt his own Province, he became at length maſter of the better part of Alexanders purchaſes.

This expedition of Seleucus was very ſtrange, and full of unlikelihoods. His train conſiſted of no more than eighteen hundred foot, and two hundred horſe, a number too ſmall to have been placed as Garriſon, in ſome one of thoſe main great Cities, againſt which he carried it into the higher Aſia. But little force is needful, to make way into ſtrong places, for him that already ſtands poſſeſſed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found ſo good a Governor, that none of them would find courage to reſiſt him; but left that work to Antigonus his own men, wiſhing them ill to ſpeed. Some of the Macedonians that were in thoſe Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of War, which by eaſie compulſion they left off, and followed new Enſigns. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and ſubmitted themſelves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection ſo general, it was not a ſafe courſe for the Antigonians, to thruſt themſelves into the Towns of moſt importance: for every man of them ſhould have been troubled with daily enemies in his own lodging. It remained that they ſhould iſſue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treaſon of one principal man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thouſand Souldiers following him, ſo diſmayed the reſt, that they did no more than ſeek to make good one ſtrong place, wherein were kept the Hoſtages and Priſoners, that Antigonus held for his ſecurity in thoſe quarters. This Caſtle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leiſure, againſt dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it; and ſo got the entire poſſeſſion of Meſopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had beſtowed in Media and Perſia, forces convenient for defence of thoſe Provinces, that were the utmoſt of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his own great Army lay between them and all enemies. Therefore when the victory at Gaza had opened unto Seleucus the way into thoſe parts; he found little impediment in the reſt of his buſineſs. Having now gotten what he ſought, it behoved him to ſeek how he might keep his gettings: for his own forces were too ſmall, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not do for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joyning unto himſelf, out of Perſia and other Countries, all needful help, came, with ten thouſand Foot, and ſeven thouſand Horſe, either to ſave all from being loſt, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won. 308

Againſt this power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horſe, and ſomewhat above three thouſand Foot, wherewith to oppoſe himſelf: his large Conqueſt of unwarlike Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himſelf from the place where his reſiſtance was expected, into certain mariſhes not far off; where he lay ſecretly waiting for ſome advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the leſs careful in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain ſecurity, his Camp was taken by ſurprize, the firſt night of his arrival; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Perſia, together with ſundry of the Captains, were ſlain; he himſelf was driven to flee for his life into the deſarts, and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whoſe gentle demeanor, after the victory, drew all Media, Suſiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further ſtroke ſtricken.

This victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new ſtile of, The Kingdom of the Greeks, an accompt much uſed by the Greeks, Chaldæans, Syrians, and other Nations in thoſe parts. I will not make any long diſputation about the firſt year of this Æra. The authority of that great Aſtrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonaſſar, was the fourſcore and ſecond year of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needleſs, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the firſt of theſe years was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonaſſar. With the obſervation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolomy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding finding the same Planet to have been so placed in the sign of Virgo, as the Chaldæans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourscore and second year; and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestial bodies, are the surest marks of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrances in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldom ambiguous, by reason of unremembred fractions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly material. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the several Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

Pol. Almag. lib. 11. cap. 7. & 8.

§. VIII.

How Ptolomy lost all he won in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had been subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill success.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure to go up to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he stayed longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could have spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, having lost the battel at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his own goods, his Pages, and Servants, in free gift, and therewithal a courteous message, to this effect: That no personal hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only terms of honor, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrel, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken Troops; drew as many as could bespared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeem his honor lost. Antigonus upon the first news of this overthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolomy wan upon a beardless Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon desire that his son, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his own reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his own business in Cœlosyria; thinking it enough to spend part of his Army under Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Cilles too much undervalued the power of such an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, having lately saved his life by flight, would now be more careful of having a a fair way at his back, than adventurous in setting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all fear; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless march; he took the lightest of his Army, and made his journey with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the sudden, without any battel, Master of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repair the credit of Demetrius, which his loss at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equal favour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomy so weakned by this loss, nor Demetrius so emboldned by his victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomy; and therefore he fortified himself in places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other side was loth to engage himself in an enterprize, wherein he might perceive, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driven to make a shameful retrait, or a dangerous adventure of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither he made all haste, not so much to relieve his son, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceeding, that the young man had so well acquitted quitted himſelf, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to encreaſe the reputation of this late victory, he brought ſuch forces, as might ſerve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honor of all ſhould be referred unto the good foundation laid by his ſon; whom from this time forwards, he imployed in matters of greateſt importance.

Ptolomy had now leſs reaſon to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have aſſailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of conſultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains adviſed him to retire into Egypt, alledging many good arguments to that purpoſe: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that courſe; not without remembrance of the good ſucceſs againſt Perdiccas, in the like defenſive War. So he departed out of Syria, preſerving his honor; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any ſudden paſſion of fear: and he departed at fair leiſure, not only carrying his treaſures along with him, but ſtaying to diſmantle ſome principal Cities, that he thought moſt likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell preſently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: ſo eaſie was it in thoſe times, for the Captain of a ſtrong Army, to make himſelf Lord of a great Province.

We may juſtly wonder, that theſe Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations (which the victory of Alexander had over-run with ſo haſty a courſe, as gave him not leiſure to take any good view of them) were ſo eaſily held not only by himſelf, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot contentions for ſuperiority between the King of Iſrael, and thoſe of Damaſcus; between Egypt and Babylon; Babylon and Nineve; the Perſians and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once been in thoſe people; which are now ſo patient of a foreign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they ſuffer themſelves to be diſtributed, fought for, won, loſt, and again recovered by contentious Maſters; as if they had no title to their own heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more ſtrange, if we ſhall conſider, how the ſeveral States of Greece (many of which had never poſſeſſed ſo large Dominion, as might cauſe their ſpirits to ſwell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occaſions of liberty: and how theſe proud Conquerors were glad to offer it, deſiring to have them rather friends than ſervants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It muſt therefore be noted, that moſt of theſe Countries had always been ſubject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Perſians long ſince had rooted out, and held them in ſuch bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of foreign Maſters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-born Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Perſian Empire: ſo that wanting within themſelves all ſoveraign power, or high authority, the life and ſpirit of every Eſtate; they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Perſian Satrapæ, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains after the death of Alexander, ſtrive to lay hold upon thoſe Provinces, which had many ages been ſubject unto them, and ſcarce four years in quiet poſſeſſion of their enemies; or why at leaſt they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conqueror did ceaſe to affright them) to get their ſhares among his followers, if not wholly to diſpoſſeſs them of their new purchaſes: it is a queſtion, wherein who is not ſatisfied, may find no leſs reaſon to ſuſpect the Hiſtory, than authority to confirm it. For we ſeldom read, that any ſmall Kingdom, prevailing againſt a far greater, hath made ſo entire a conqueſt, in the compaſs of ten years, as left unto the vanquiſhed no hope of recovery, nor means to rebel; eſpecially when ſuch diſorders, or rather utter confuſion hath enſued, by the fury of civil War among the Victors.

The cauſe why the Macedonians held ſo quietly the Perſian Empire, is well ſet down by Machiavel; and concerns all other Kingdoms, that are ſubject unto the like form of Government: the ſum whereof is this; Whereſoever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of ſlaves, there is the conqueſt eaſie, and ſoon aſſured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to win all, and harder to keep that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkiſh Empire, and the Kingdom of France. If any Invader ſhould prevail ſo far upon Turky, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he uſeth not to ſuffer alive) were taken or ſlain: the whole Empire would quickly be won, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassaes, how great soever they may seem, are meer slaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personal regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of private gain should not countervail, all apparent matter of fear. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by far the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royal blood, there are in that Kingdom store of great men; who are mighty in their several Countries, and having certain Royalties and Principalities of their own, are able to raise War in all quarters of the Realm; whereunto the remembrance of their own ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will always stir up and inflame them: so that until every ones piece were won, and every one (an endless work) of the chief Nobility brought under or destroyed, the victory were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth often times make way for an Invader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a fair entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten; for they look to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they soon return to their old allegiance, upon condition to keep what they have, unless they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himself. The Turk, on the other side, needs not to fear any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principal men. The greatest mischief that any of them could work against him, were the betraying of some frontier Town, or the wilful loss of a battel: which done, the Traytor hath spent his sting, and must either fly to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harm, he must adventure to excuse himself unto his Master, who seldom forgives the Captain, that hath not strived by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than such as are subject unto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principal men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him assistance; if adversity should make him stand in need of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turks Bassaes, or Provincial Governors, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the loss and utter ruin of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foot of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conqueror, who hath no other device painted on his Ensign, than the picture of slavery.

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended upon meer favour of the Prince. Some indeed there were of the Royal blood, and others, descended from the Princes that joyned with Darius, the son of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia, but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safety in not medling with affairs of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the Kings Uncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking unto these great Monarchs. That upon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves, it is easie to be discerned, in that example of cruelty, practised by Xerxes upon his own brother Masistes; which hath been formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapæ, or Governors of the Provinces, it is needless to cite examples, proving them to have been meer slaves: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Persia, may be added the general want of liberty convenient among the people: a matter no less available, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, than is the cause assigned by Machiavel. For as Æsop his Ass did not care to run from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heavier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to bear: so the Nations, that endure the worst under their own Princes, are not greatly fearfull of a forein yoke; Nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they find it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes bear such faithful affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French. This enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Towns that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors: and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations that had been subject unto the posterity of Alexanders followers, to serve the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had been imposed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tameness, which we find in those that had been subjects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them under, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he sent, fell upon the Nabathæans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians for Mirrh, Frankincense, and other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with five hundered talents of silver, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their coming was sudden and unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabathæans overtook them, and finding them weary with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of four thousand foot, and six hundered horse, only fifty horse escaped. To revenge this loss, Demetrius was set out with a great power: yet all in vain; for he was not resisted by any Army, but by the natural defence of a vast Wilderness, lack of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he lost not much honour: for they craved it, and gave him presents. Returning from the Nabathæans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceived hope of great profit, that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandry of his Son, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the work: but they were slain by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprises, with the ill success accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage against Ptolomy: when the news of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loss of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the War into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria, and the lower Asia should have been exposed to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his Son did less. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessity of fight; some places they fortified and kept: Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men than he could spare, neither did he get much; and therefore was fain to set out the bravery of his Expedition, by burning and spoiling the Country: which he did thereby the more alienate, and, as it were, acknowledge to belong unto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his own assured.

Antigonus had laid upon his Son a peremptory commandment, to return unto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seem) that in such an unsettled state of things, either the War might be ended, by the fury of the first brunt; or else it would be vain to strive against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become less terrible to the enemy. Demetrius therefore leaving behind him five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the War, than to effect much, where himself with greater forces could do little more than nothing, forsook the enterprize, and went back to his Father.

A general Peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

THese ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselves with uneffectual travel, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred, but meer desire of Empire, had moved them to enter into the War; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulness growing upon the slow advancement of their several hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occasion might better serve to fight again.

Besides that main point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gave a fair, but a false colour, to the business; That the Son of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King when he came to full age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at liberty. The advancement of young Alexander to his Fathers Kingdom, seems to have been a matter forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to have made himself Lord of all. But this, indeed more neerly touched Cassander. For in his custody was the young Prince and his Mother: neither did he keep them in a sort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that War, wherein they had seen the old Queen Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to put them in possession of the Empire. The mutual hatred and fear between them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this conclusion of peace, grew up faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turn their favourable expectation, towards the Son of their late renowned King.

All this either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince must first have possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poor office, of Captain over a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either do as they had done under Aridæus; or better, as being better acquainted with their own strength. He, in the meane time, by his readiness to acknowledge the true Heir, had freed himself from that ill-favoured imputation, of seeking to make himself Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, Of restoring the Greeks to their liberty. This liberty had hitherto been the subject of much idle discourse: but it never took effect. Antigonus held scarce any Town of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Country: which if he should set free, he must be a poor Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrel against him, as against a Disturber of the common Peace.

In the mean season, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek Seas, together with a great Army, and mony enough to entertaine a greater, might serve to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes as high as ever they had been.

With much disadvantage do many men contend against one that is equal to them all in puissance. Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not do withall: for, where every one mans help is necessary to the War, there may any one make his own peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects unto any man, much less to the Son of an Asiatique woman, of whom they had long since refused to hear mention. Therefore he took a short course, and caused both the Child and his Mother to be slain: freeing thereby himself in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yielding up his Government, which he must have done when the Child had come to age. Roxane was a Lady of singular beauty, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to have her Son, being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heir to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of Alexander, she had used the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her own bloody malice, upon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custom of those Countries, wherein plurality of Wives is held no crime. For, having by a counterfeit Letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poor Lady into her hands, she did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were she and her Son made a way, in the like secret fashion; even at such time as the neer approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of War; wherein every one perswaded himself of success, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had work enough at home) began to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: while their Master was carefull careful in following other, and ſome greater matters that were more ſecretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece: yet did the ſame argument miniſter unto Ptolomy matter of quarrel, againſt both him and Caſſander; Ptolomy complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garriſons into ſome Towns, which ought, in fair dealing, to be ſet at liberty. Under colour of redreſſing this enormity, he ſent an Army into Cilicia, where he won four Towns, and ſoon after loſt them, without much labour of his own or his enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a ſtrong Fleet, he ran along the coaſt of Aſia, winning many places: and in that voyage allured unto him a Nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but diſcontented with the ill requital of his ſervices) whom finding ſhortly, as falſe to himſelf as he had been to his own Uncle, he was fain to put to death. But in doing theſe things, his deſire to ſet the Greeks at liberty, appeared not ſo plain, as he wiſhed that it ſhould: for their caſe was no way bettered by his moleſting Antigonus in Aſia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, he made at the laſt an Expedition into Greece it ſelf: where having ſet free ſome little Iſlands, and landed in Peloponneſus, he raiſed ſo great an expectation of finiſhing the long-deſired work, that Crateſipolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyſperchons Son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Sycion and Corinth.

Ptolomy had conceived a vain belief, that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and aſſiſtance, would all of them take heart and riſe up in arms; whereby with little labour their liberty might be gotten; and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal benefit. But long ſervitude had wellneer extinguiſhed the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recover freedom, had ſo tired their ſpirits, that they would no more ſtir in purſuit thereof; but ſate idly ſtill, as wiſhing it to fall into their mouthes.

The Lacedæmonians, about theſe times, began to fortifie their Town with walls; truſting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the diſcipline that upheld it, were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Town and Territory.

The Athenians were become as humble ſervants, as they had been in times paſt inſolent Maſters: erecting as many ſtatues in honor of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were days in the year. This Demetrius was now their Governor; and he governed them with much moderation: but, in ſpight of their hearts, as being ſet over them by Caſſander. By this baſe temper of the principal Cities, it is eaſie to gather, how the reſt of the Country ſtood affected. Ptolomy could not get them to ſet their helping-hands to their own good, and to furniſh him with the promiſed ſupplies of mony and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thraldom; as judging the commodity that would ariſe by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight than the loſs that Caſſander ſhould receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the work in hand. But when he found ſuch difficulty in the buſineſs, he changed his purpoſe: And renewing his former friendſhip with Caſſander, he retained Sycion and Corinth in his own poſſeſſion.

Before the coming of Ptolomy into Greece, Caſſander had been held occupied with very much work. For (beſides his pains taken in Wars among barbarous Princes) he found means to allure unto himſelf the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponneſus, and about Helleſpont: making his own advantage of their diſcontentments. By the like skilful practice he freed himſelf from a greater danger, and made thoſe murthers which he had committed ſeem the leſs odious, by teaching his enemies to do the like. Old Polyſperchon, that had made ſo great a ſtir in the reign of Aridæus, did after the death of Roxane and her child, enter again upon the Stage: leading in his hand another Son of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barſine the daughter of Artabazus Perſian; but had been leſs eſteemed than the ſon of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or elſe perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did bear unto Roxane. At this time the death of his Brother had moved ſuch compaſſion, and regard of his being Alexanders only living child, had procured unto him ſuch good will, that the demand which Polyſperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very juſt and honorable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joyned with this young Prince: yet wanted he not ſufficient ſtrength of hands, if the heart of him that leaſt ought, had not been moſt falſe. Caſſander had raiſed an Army to withſtand his entry into Macedon: but little truſt could he repoſe in that Army, whoſe wiſhes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Polysperchon himself with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he prevailed so far, that the old Villain was contented to murther his Pupil; chusing rather with many curses and foul dishonor, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Army; than to purchase a noble fame with dangerous travel, in maintaining his faith, unto both his dead and living Soveraigns.

Antigonus had not all this while been asleep; though his losses were hitherto the chief witnesses of his having been a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present to retain his own: and therefore took order for the recovery of those places which Ptolomy had taken pains to win. As for the rest, it no way grieved him to see Cassander incur the general hatred of men, by committing those murthers of which the profit was like to redound unto him that was the most powerful, or to see Polysperchon and Ptolomy sweat in a busie War against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leisure, and have thought the time well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vain with long strife, his Armies and Treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughty conceits, he demeaned himself among his followers; looking big upon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great loss to be forsaken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune whereon their own should have depended. Against this envy of his men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to give him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra Sister unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes: whom he had a great desire to take to Wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever she discovered much unwillingness thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for fear of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive means: either because his fancy, being an old man, was not over-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her Brother in Asia; hoping belike to find a new Husband in his Camp. But neither any of those brave Captains, that were, in times following so hot in love with her, durst then aspire unto her marriage: nor did her Brother, full of other cares, trouble himself with providing her of an Husband. She therefore, being a lusty Widow, suffered her blood so far to prevail against her honor, that she supplied the want of an Husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: saying, That she was his Sister, and must be allowed this liberty, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death the Empire lay in a manner void, and the portion due to her therein grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had been: then did many seek to obtain her, while she her self desired only a proper man, with whom she might lead a merry life. To this purpose did she invite Leonatus unto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, she had her choice of all the great Commanders, Antigonus, Ptolomy, Lysimachus and Cassander, being all her earnest Wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had Wives already; Ptolomy had many Wives, and many Concubines whom he respected as much as his Wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindred not his suit: peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutual toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her self, and was taking her journey from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputy in that City, made her to stay, until his Masters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolf by the ears: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her go. She would not be his Wife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keep her prisoner, had been the way, by which he might have incurred a general hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady less respected than Alexanders own Sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commodity of so fair a title to the Kingdom, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governor of Sardes, willing him in any case to do it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain women about her put in trust with the murther: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischievous conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least in his own opinion:

opinion: but the world was leſs fooliſh, than to be ſo deluded. How the murther was detected, we need not ask: for ſeldom is that bloody crime unrevealed, and never ſo ill ſmothered, as when great perſons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the great extinguiſhed, and it was extinguiſhed by the hands of ſuch as thought upon nothing leſs than the execution of Gods juſtice, due unto the cruelty of theſe powerful, but mercileſs Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by theſe Tyrants, upon ſo wicked foundations of innocent blood, were ſoon after caſt down, overwhelming themſelves or their children, with the ruines, as the ſequel will declare.

How Demetrius, the ſon of Antigonus, gave liberty to Athens, expelling the Garriſons of Caſſander out of thoſe parts. The immoderate honor decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

NOne being left alive that had any title to the Kingdom; it ſtood with good reaſon, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superiour, ſhould freely profeſs themſelves Kings in name, as they were already in ſubſtance. Yet had this name ill-beſeemed the weaker, while the ſtrongeſt of all did forbear it: neither ſeemed it convenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crown his laſt action with ſuch a title, as if he had attained unto greatneſs by that foul murther, the infamy whereof he was careful how to diſcharge from his own head. He purpoſed therefore to undertake a plauſible enterprize, even the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get ſuch honor as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of Royalty, whereof in ſeeming modeſty, he was not covetous. To this purpoſe he delivered a ſtrong Army, with a Navy of two hundred and fifty ſail, and fifty thouſand talents of ſilver, unto Demetrius his ſon: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in ſetting all the Country free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: ſo that without reſiſtance he entred the Haven; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolemy, Caſſanders good friend, had been arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, and what was the cauſe of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations: Demetrius Phalereus forſook the Town, and withdrew himſelf to Thebes under ſafe conduct; only the Garriſon in Munichya ſtrove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the ſiege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garriſon of Caſſander, and ſo reſtored the City to liberty.

I think it not impertinent, ſometimes to relate ſuch accidents, as may ſeem no better than meer trifles: for even by trifles are the qualities of great perſons as well diſcloſed, as by their great actions; becauſe in matters of importance, they commonly ſtrain themſelves, to the obſervance of general commended rules; in leſſer things they follow the current of their own Natures. The Lady Crateſipolis lay in Patras, and had a great deſire to ſee Demetrius; hoping, belike, that ſhe might by his means better her eſtate, and recover her Towns of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomy; to whoſe Lieutenant in thoſe places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the ſurrender of them. Yet the only buſineſs pretended was love. He being advertiſed hereof, left his forces in the Country of Megara, and taking a company of his lighteſt armed, for guard of his perſon, made a long journey to meet with her. This troop alſo he cauſed to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might ſee her when ſhe came. As cloſely as the buſineſs was carried, ſome of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus; and bring him to any terms of reaſon, by taking his dear ſon priſoner. Their project fell but a little ſhort of the effect. For they came ſo ſuddenly upon him, that he had no better ſhift, than to muffle himſelf in an old cloak, and creep away diſguiſed; leaving them to ranſack his Tent. There was in this Prince a ſtrange medly of conditions; eſpecially an extreme diſſoluteneſs in wanton pleaſures, and a painful induſtry in matters of War. He was of a moſt amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deviſing Engines of War, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to reform his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For adverſity made his valour more active: proſperity puffed him with over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he liſted. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her Wheel, till ſhe had wound up the thred of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Camp, and finishing his business at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the issue of a siege, to assail Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, until it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the City. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the walls, prevailed upon the resolution of those that lay within it, and wan the place in two days. The walls, and all the defences of that piece against the City, were levelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withal was given their liberty, with promise to aid them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues: converting to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs which the vertues of their Ancestors had suited unto more manly arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius the name of Kings; they consecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their City, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius, The alighter; they called them by the names of the gods their Saviours, ordaining that every year, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent unto the Oracle of Jupiter, or Apollo.

It were a frivilous diligence to rehearse all their flatteries, these being so gross. Hereby they not only corrupted the young Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handsomely take upon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians, unless he would seem to approve their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corn and Timber to build ships; he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather so weak is great power in resisting the assauls of flattery.

§. XI.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolomy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

FRom this glorious work, Antigonus called away Demetrius, unto a business of greater difficulty; meaning to employ his service against Ptolomy, in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a general Council, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Country. About the same time Antigonus withdrew his own Garrison out of Imbros, committing their liberty entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appear, that as he would not permit any other to oppress the Greeks, so would he be far from doing it himself. This was enough to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends: it followed, that he should convert his forces, to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A pitiful Tragedy had lately hapned in Cyprus, through the indiscretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicocles, King of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so far that he thought himself past excuse; by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the false-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounding Nicocles his house with Souldiers, required, in Ptolomies name, to have him yielded to the death. Nicocles offered to clear himself; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity caused the unhappy King to rid himself of life: and his death struck such an impression into his wife, that she not only slew her self, but perswaded the wives of her husbands brethren to do the like. Also those brethren of Nicocles, unto whom Ptolomy had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddenness of this calamity, did shut up the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was; Nicocles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet it is to be thought, that much diſlike fell alſo upon Ptolomy: as men that are grieved, caſt an ill affection even upon thoſe that gave the furtheſt removed occaſion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power ſufficient, againſt any oppoſition that Ptolomy was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing againſt him, either becauſe they had ſmall ſtrength or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being ſure that they ſhould not themſelves have the rule of their own Country. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garriſons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to ſave himſelf within the walls of Salamis, where he was ſo hardly beſieged, that without ſtrong ſuccour, he had no likehood to make good the place, much leſs to retain poſſeſſion of the whole Iſland. His greateſt help at the preſent was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good uſage (when any of them were taken priſoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keep from returning to him, with the firſt opportunity. Moſt of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keep them faithful. Yet could not this their reſolution have ſtood long againſt the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as reſolute, and againſt his terrible Engines of battery, if Ptolomy had not haſted to the reſcue.

Ptolomy brought with him a hundered and forty Gallies, beſides two hundered Ships of burden, for tranſporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible ſhew, when it was deſcribed afar; though more than half of it was unfit for ſervice in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Ptolomy ſent unto Demetrius a threatning meſſage: willing him to be gone, unleſs he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young gallant repayd him with words of as much bravery, promiſing to let him eſcape upon condition, that he ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of Sycion and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundered and eighteen Gallies; but they were, for the moſt part, greater than thoſe of Ptolomy; better ſtored with weapons fit for that ſervice; and very well furniſhed with Engines in the prows, to beat upon the enemy. Nevertheleſs he ſtood in great doubt of threeſcore Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, leſt Menelaus with them ſhould ſet upon his back: in which caſe, it was very likely that all would go very ill with him. Againſt this miſchief, he beſtowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keep Menelaus from iſſuing forth, and ſetting his horſemen on the ſhore, to give what aſſiſtance they could, he with the reſt of the Fleet, puts to Sea againſt Ptolomy.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtful ſucceſs. The generals were not ranged oppoſite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his own Fleet. Each of them prevailed againſt the ſquadron wherewith he encountered; but the ſucceſs of Demetrius was to better purpoſe. For his victory in one part was ſuch, as cauſed others to fall out of order, and finally drave all to betake themſelves unto ſpeedy flight. As for Ptolomy, he was fain to leave his advantage upon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might relieve and animate thoſe of his own which needed him in another: wherein he found his loſs over-great to be repaired, by contending any longer againſt the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to ſave himſelf, in hope of better event, that might follow ſome other time.

There fell out in this battel no unuſual accident; yet was the victory greater than could have been expected. The occaſions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-ſervices, which the Greeks and Phœnicians that were with Demetrius, had above thoſe which followed Ptolomy: partly, the good furniture of the Ships, wherein conſiſted no leſs, than in the quality of thoſe with whom they were manned. Further, we may reaſonably judge, that the two hundered ſhips of burthen, carrying the ſtrength of Ptolomies Army, did not more encourage his own men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and ſtood aloof. For though it were fitting that they ſhould ſo do; yet a multitude, prepoſſeſſed with vain conceits, will commonly apprehend very ſlight occaſions to think themſelves abandoned. Beſides all this, the expectation that Menelaus, iſſuing with his fleet out of Salamis ſhould charge the enemy in the ſtern, was utterly fruſtrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ſhips appointed to bar up the mouth of the Haven: which they manfully performed, as great neceſſity required.

Such diſappointment of expectation doth much abate the courage of men in fight: eſpecially of the aſſailants: whereas on the contrary, they find that ſome part of their fears vain, do easily gather hopeful spirits, and conceive an opinion of their own ability, to do more than they thought upon, out of their not suffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victory were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomy had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of fortune; but yielded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Army, consisting of twelve thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Egyptian by Land; none of them reposing any more confidence in Ptolomy, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Army they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the Isle of Cyprus, for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a year, till he were advertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honored with the Message of these good news. Aristodemus had bethought himself of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyful errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himself landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the ship; and so all alone he went forward, looking very sadly, that no part of his tidings might appear in his countenance. Report of his arrival (for it was not known where he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after messenger to meet him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a look, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he fair and softly forward with a great throng at his heels (that served well to set out his Pageant) until he came in sight of Antigonus, who could not contain himself, but went down to meet him at the Gate, and hear the news. Then did Aristodemus, upon the sudden, with a high voyce salute Antigonus by the name of King; uttering the greatness of the victory (with as much pomp, as before he had covered it, with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gave that name of King, both to Antigonus and his son Demetrius. Antigonus, in requital of the long suspence, wherein Aristodemus had held him, said, That it should also be long ere he received his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not wish a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his son.

When it was once noised abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings; it was not long ere their fellows were ready to follow the good example. Ptolomy his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord should be thought a man dejected for the loss of a fleet; therefore they saluted him also King. Lysimachus in Thrace had boldness enough to put the Diadem about his own head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the barbarous people, taken upon him as King: but now he used the stile indifferently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himself contented with his own name: whereby, howsoever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his cruelty against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sons after him were bold to usurp, though with ill success, as will appear when they shall enter upon the Stage, whereon these old Tragedians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boistrous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Wars between the Kings of Egypt, Aſia, Macedon, Thrace, and others; untill all Alexanders Princes were conſumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus againſt Egypt, with ill ſucceſs.

ALl the reſt of theſe Kings had taken that name upon them, in imitation of Antigonus himſelf, as beſeeming his greatneſs: which was ſuch as gave him hope to ſwallow them up, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his own ſtrength, he reſolved to ſingle out Ptolomy, and make him an example to others: who ſhould hardly be able to ſtand, when the greateſt of them was fallen. To this purpoſe he prepared an Army of eighteen thouſand foot, and eight thouſand Horſe, with fourſcore and three Elephants: as likewiſe a fleet of an hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ſhips of burthen. The Land forces he commanded in perſon: of the Navy Demetrius was Admiral.

When all was ready for the journey, the Sea-men adviſed him to ſtay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the ſetting of the Pleiades. But his haſty deſire to prevent all preparations for reſiſtance that Ptolomy ſhould make, rejected this counſel; imputing it rather to their fear than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Town which he had built in Syria, and called after his own name, that was ſoon changed into Seleucia, by his mortal enemy) and came to Gaza, where he met with his Fleet. The neerer that he drew to Egypt, the more haſte he made: thinking by celerity to prevail more than by his great power. He cauſed his Souldiers to carry ten dayes proviſion of Victuals; and had many Camels loaden with all neceſſaries for paſſing the Deſarts, over which he marched with no ſmall toil, though he met with no reſiſtance. At Mount Caſſius, which is near adjoyning to Nilus, he ſaw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not far from the ſhore, in ill caſe, and many Ships wanting. It had been ſorely beaten with foul weather, wherein ſome were loſt, others driven back to Gaza, or ſcattered elſewhere into ſuch creeks as they could recover: Demetrius himſelf, with the beſt and ſtrongeſt Veſſels, did ſo long bear it up againſt the winde, that all his freſh water was ſpent; in which extremity, he and all his muſt have periſhed, had not the tempeſt ceaſed when it did, and Antigonus appeared in ſight, from whom theſe over-wearied, thirſty and Sea-beaten Souldiers received relief. After theſe painful travels, there followed a War no leſs painful than to little purpoſe; for Ptolomy had ſo fortified all the paſſages upon the River of Nilus, as he aſſured himſelf either to end the war there, or if his guards ſhould happen to be forced, yet could it not be done but ſo much to the weakning of the Aſſailants, as he ſhould afterward, with a ſecond Army (which he held entire) entertain the Invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus ſought, was to come to blows ſpeedily: Ptolomy on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gave him water enough, but wood he had none to warm it: and while Antigonus aſſaulted the Rampiers, raiſed upon the River, in vain, Ptolomy aſſayed the faith of his Souldiers, with good ſucceſs; for, with great gifts, and greater promiſes, he ferried them over ſo faſt, as had not Antigonus thruſt ſome aſſured Regiments upon the paſſages next the enemy, and in the mean while taken a reſolution to return, Ptolomy had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their eſcape, and thoſe he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the ſame ill ſucceſs that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he invaded Egypt, had he not readily removed his Army further off, from the noyſe of their entertainment, that had already been won from him. To prevent therefore as well the preſent danger of his ſtay, as the ſhame following a forc'd retrait, he ſecretly practiſed the advice of his Councel, upon whom the burthen muſt be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

It is indeed leſs prejudicial in ſuch like caſes, that errors, diſhonours, and loſſes, be laid on Counſellors and Captains, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is far more precious than that of a Vaſſal. Charles the fifth, as many other Princes have done, laid the loſs and diſhonour he received in the invaſion of France, by the way of Provence, to Antony de Leva, whether juſtly or no, I know not; but howſoever, all the Hiſtorians of that time agree, that the ſorrow thereof coſt that brave Captain his life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubtfull enterpriſes, is rather a teſtimony of love, than of wiſdom, in the giver; for the ill ſucceſs is always caſt upon the Counſel, the good never wants a Father, though a falſe one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have ſometime known it, that great Commanders, who are for the preſent in place of Kings, have not only been diſſwaded, but held, in a kind, by ſtrong hand, from hazzarding their own perſons, and yet have thoſe kind of Mutiners never been called to a Marſhals Court.

§. II.

How the City of Rhodes was beſieged by Demetrius.

THis departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead Carcaſſes, and a great deal of joy in Egypt. Ptolomy held a ſolemn Feaſt, and ſent Meſſengers abroad, loaden with glad news, to Seleucus, Lyſimachus, and Caſſander, his Confederates: ſtrongly encouraging all that ſide, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defenſive War. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himſelf with another interpretation, calling the joyes of his enemies for witneſſes of his own greatneſs, ſeeing they aroſe but from ſo little things: his enemies being but bare ſavers by the laſt bargain, and himſelf, as he ſuppoſed, having loſt but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retrait. Howſoever it were, yet he meant to follow his affairs henceforth in another faſhion; for that which he could not cleave aſunder by great blows, he purpoſed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches firſt, to fell the Tree it ſelf with the more facility. To effect which, he reſolved (leaving the great ones to grow a while) to root up the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the fore-named Confederates ſhould be forc't either to relieve, or to loſe; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike proviſion promiſed him victory.

At this time the City of Rhodes was very mighty, being well governed, and having long held it ſelf in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the trade of thoſe parts, and therein a great deal of riches to it ſelf; to maintain which, and to encreaſe it, it furniſhed and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Ships, by which it not only beat off all Pyrates and petty Theeves, but the reputation of their ſtrength was thereby ſo much increaſed, as all the Neighbour Princes ſought their alliance and confederacy.

In this ſo dangerous a time (in which they muſt either refuſe all that ſought them, and ſo ſtand friendleſs and apart; or joyn themſelves to ſome one, and thereby forego the peace, by which their greatneſs had grown) their affections carried them to the Egyptian: both becauſe the greateſt part of their trade lay that way, as alſo for that Antigonus his diſpoſition, greatneſs, and neighbourhood was fearfull unto them. This affection of theirs, with ſome other paſſages more apparent, gave argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himſelf againſt them by petty injuries, of taking ſome of their ſhips, with ſuch other grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to purſue the War againſt them openly and ſtrongly. All things ſoon after ordered according to the greatneſs of the enterpriſe, he employed his Son Demetrius againſt them in their own Iſland, who brought ſuch terror upon the Citizens, that laying aſide all reſpect of friendſhip and honour, they offered him their aſſiſtance and ſervice againſt whomſoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perſwaded by fear, and not by love; raiſed his demands to an intollerable height, requiring a hundred Hoſtages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ſhips of War as himſelf pleaſed. Theſe conditions, more properly to be impoſed upon a State already conquered, than on thoſe who as yet had heard of nothing but a conſtrained aſſiſtance, reſtored unto the Rhodians their loſt courage, and made them reſolve to defend their liberty to the laſt man: this taught them to infranchiſe all their able bond-men, and wiſely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themſelves fellow-ſlaves with them.

Demetrius having refuſed the fair conditions

tions offered (as the Rhodians the fearfull ones propounded unto them) makes preparation for a long ſiege, and finding no appearance to carry the place in fury, he ſet in hand with his Engines of battery; in the invention and uſe of which, he did never ſhew himſelf a greater Artiſan, than in this War. But in concluſion, after the Citizens had ſuſtained all the aſſaults given them for a whole year, after many brave ſallies out of the Town, and the famine which they endured within the Town, which had proved far more extream, if Ptolomy had not with many hazzards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embaſſadors, gave over the ſiege; a hundred hoſtages they gave him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magiſtrates and Officers of the City.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the uſual policy of War, and State: for while with the flower of all his Fathers forces he lay before Rhodes, Caſſander recovered many of thoſe places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Caſſander make the War as in former times, by practice and ſurpriſe, but by a ſtrong and well compounded Army, which he himſelf lead as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly diſtreſſed and endangered Athens it ſelf. On the other ſide (though with leſs ſucceſs) did Polyſperchon invade Peloponneſus. Theſe dangerous undertakings upon Greece, adviſed the Athenians and Ætolians to diſpatch their Embaſſadours towards Demetrius, and adviſed Demetrius rather to abandon the enterpriſe of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten by ſetting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no ſooner out of the Iſland, than that the Rhodians erected Statues in honour of Lyſimachus and Caſſander; but for Ptolomy, whom they moſt affected, and from whom they received their moſt relief, they conſulted with the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a god. The Prieſts which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gave the ſame fair anſwer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Maſter; for as Alexander conſulted the Oracle with an Army at his heels, ſo was Ptolomy at this time Lord of the ſoil: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation than that done by the Athenians, who deified Antigonus and Demetrius by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when ſo many of Alexanders Captains could not content themſelves with the ſtyle of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Caſſander deſires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtain it. Great preparations of War againſt Antigonus.

Demetrius coming with a ſtrong Fleet and Army into Greece, quickly drave Caſſander out of Attica; and purſuing his fortune, chaſed him beyond the ſtraits of Thermopylæ. Herein his reputation did much avail him; which was ſo great, that ſix thouſand of his enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So, partly by the greatneſs of his name, partly by force, he recovered in ſhort ſpace all that Caſſander held in thoſe ſtraits, and giving liberty unto the people, he beſtowed upon the Athenians thoſe pieces, which had been fortified againſt them, to block them up. Then went he into Peloponneſus, where he found the like or more eaſie ſucceſs: for he ſuddenly took Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the moſt of the Country, beſtowing liberty upon ſuch as needed it. The Town of Sicyon he tranſlated by conſent of the Citizens, from the old ſeat into another place, and called it after his own name, Demetrius. This done, he betook himſelf to his pleaſure. At the Iſthman games he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Captain General of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he deſpiſed all others, making it a matter of jeſt, that any, ſave himſelf or his father, ſhould uſurp the Name of King. But in his behaviour he was ſo farr unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leaſure, he deſerved none other name than of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as ready as ever to deviſe new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatſoever King Demetrius ſhould command, ought to be held ſacred with the gods, and juſt with men.

All Greece being now at the diſpoſition of Antigonus, Caſſander ſtood in great fear, leſt the war ſhould fall heavily upon him in Macedon: which to avoid, he knew no better way than to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadors; but had no better anſwer from Antigonus, than that he ſhould ſubmit his whole eſtate to his diſcretion. This proud demand made him look about him, and labour hard in ſolliciting his friends, both to aſſiſt him, and take heed to themſelves; neither found he them ſlow in apprehending the common danger: for Lyſimachus knew that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomy and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himself in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joint-forces they should all together set upon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would as easily scatter them, as a flock of birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceits he pleased himself, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemy. He lay at that time in his Town of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glory. But thither was brought unto him the tumultuous news of Lysimachus his victories about Hellespont. For Cassander had committed unto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to pass over into Asia, while he himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellespont, began to make hot war upon the subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to joyn with him by fair means: winning others by force, and wasting the Countrey round about.

To repress this unexpected boldness, Antigonus made hasty journeys, and came soon enough to recover his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battel. Lysimachus waited for the coming of Seleucus; keeping himself the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be soon in a readiness. The Winter also did hinder his journey: which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrel in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so forward, that he refused to yield upon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neer with a mighty Army of his own (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leasure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great aid from Ptolomy, that was joyned with his forces.

To help in this needful case, Demetrius was called over into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, upon reasonable terms: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Countrey; and that his journey might be without any such blemish of reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the Peace was, that all the Cities of Greece should be at liberty. Cassander was glad to be so rid of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise than they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found means to clear himself of all incumbrances else-where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himself to the tryal of the main controversie in Asia.

§. IV.

How Antigonus was slain in a great battel at Ipsus, neer unto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

SEleucus, with his Son Antiochus, joyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Army, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemy. In greatness of name (that helpeth much in all Wars, but especially in the Civil) they were rather unanswerable than unequal to their adversaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had been reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Usurpers of the Title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proof of his worth in many great services of all kinds, and enriched the art of War with many inventions, which even his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had some times flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stoln away from him to save his life, with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journey; and Lysimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his own from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation of that which was yielded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough to receive any benefit that Fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy and well exercised: many of them having served under Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space ſpace of two and twenty years had conſumed the greateſt number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were eaſily perſwaded, that in this battel they muſt either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes; whereas Antigonus his men could diſcern no other neceſſity of fighting, than the obſtinate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Maſter of all. Antigonus had about threeſcore and ten thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and threeſcore and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were ſix thouſand ſhort of him in number of their foot; in horſe they had the odds of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War: which helps, though they little had availed the Perſians, yet were they not to be deſpiſed, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himſelf, either troubled with the unexpected greatneſs of his enemies forces, or preſaging little good like to enſue, grew very penſive, communing much in private with his Son whom he commended to the Army as his Succeſſor: whereas in former times he had never been ſo jocund, as towards the hour of battel, nor had been accuſtomed to make his Son, or any other private to, his counſel, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards deviſed, I hold it needleſs to recount. Diana of Epheſus dwelt neer to the place of battel, a buſie goddeſs in many great fights; and therefore likely to have been thruſt into the fable, if any matter neerly reſembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is eaſie to believe, that theſe two ſo gallant Armies, containing well neer all the ſtrength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by ſuch worthy Commanders, and whom the iſſue thereof did highly concern. Yet are few of the particulars recorded: an eaſie loſs in regard of the much variety, wherewith every ſtory aboundeth in this kind. The moſt memorable things in the battel, were theſe: Demetrius with his beſt force of Horſe, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was ſo tranſported with the heat of his good ſucceſs, that he never gave over his purſuit, but left his Father naked, and loſt thereby both him, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, he interpoſed his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus; and with many troops of horſe offering to break upon the enemies battel, whereſoever it lay moſt open, he did ſo terrifie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather choſe to revolt from their Lord, whileſt they were fairly invited, than to ſuſtain the fury of ſo dangerous an impreſſion. This cowardize, or rather Treaſon of ſome, diſcouraged others; and finally, caſt them all into flight; expoſing their General to the laſt end of his deſtinies. Antigonus was then fourſcore years old, very fat and unweildy, ſo that he was unapt for flight, if his high ſpirit could have entertained any thought thereof. He had about him ſome of his moſt truſty followers, and as many others as he could hold together. When one that perceived a great troop making towards his perſon, told him, Sir King, yonder company means to charge you; He anſwered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon Demetrius will relieve us. Thus expecting to the very laſt, that his Son ſhould come to the reſcue, he received ſo many Darts into his body, as took away his lately ambitious, but then fearfull hopes, together with his troubleſome life.

His great ability in matter of Arms, together with his unſatiable deſire of Empire, have ſufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loved by his friends; as one that could not moderate his Fortune, but uſed inſolence toward all alike, as if it had been ſome vertue neereſt repreſenting a Kingly Majeſty. This was the cauſe that ſo many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Army forſook him in his laſt neceſſity. For thoſe Kings and Princes that call all the carefull endeavours of their Vaſſals, only duty and debt; and are more apt to puniſh the leaſt offences, than to reward the greateſt ſervices: ſhall finde themſelves upon the firſt change of fortune, (ſeeing it is love only that ſtayes by adverſity) not only the moſt friendleſs, but even the moſt contemptible, and deſpiſed of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified upon his Son.

§. V.

How Demetrius, forsaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Seleucus and Ptolomy, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entring into quarrels.

FOR Demetrius, at his return from the idle pursuit of young Antiochus, finding all quite lost, was glad to save himself, with four thousand horse, and five thousand foot, by a speedy retreat unto Ephesus, whence he made great haste unto Athens, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilest he was in the midst of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadours met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their City. These were Embassadours, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shameless ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his misery, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamity more afflict the unfortunate Prince, than to see his adversity despised by those whom he had thought his surest Friends. Yet was he fain to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Haven, of which he now stood in great need; and therefore was fain to speak them fair, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall live to teach them their old language, and speak unto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he sailed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were every where broken up; the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Army and Fleet, without money or means wherewith to sustain him and his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerours, and those few places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve: for to put himself into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power; and to include himself in any of them, how strong soever, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeed to bury himself and his estate: He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest bryers, fell upon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdom, whereof he gave all the spoil that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his own losses having been too great to be repayed again by small prizes.

In the mean while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being present, and Master of the field; for neither Ptolomy nor Cassander were at the overthrow given, having only sent certain troops to re-inforce the Army which Seleucus led, who took hold of a part of Asia the less, and all Syria, being no otherwise divided from his own Territory, than by the River of Euphrates, For there had not any order been taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that War, which they made only in their own common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the Victory, at which nevertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the over-greatness of Seleucus brought no less danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted upon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined; for he read it in the Law universal of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendships on all sides, and cure themselves of all unprofitable passion: the hatred of each to other, and their loves being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so far too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slain Antigonus the Father, and driven Demetrius the Son out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himself with Stratonica, Demetrius his Daughter; and so by Demetrius to serve his turn against Lysimachus.

The story of this Stratonica, with whom young Antigonus, the Son of Seleucus fell so passionately in love, and so distempered, as Seleucus his Father, to save his Sons life, gave her (though she were his Wife) unto him; and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; between Ptolomy and Lysimachus; between Demetrius and Cassander; between Demetrius and Ptolomy, though for the present it brought him again into the rank of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages between Christian Kings have done in latter times, namely between the Austrians, the Arragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of those elder times been found more faithfull, than those of

of the ſame latter times have been, as in the ſtories of Charls the Eighth of France, and of Charls the Emperour, of Francis the Firſt, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan, and others, the Reader may obſerve: between whom from the year of our Lord, One thouſand four hundred ninety and five, when Charls the Eighth undertook the Conqueſt of Naples, to the year One thouſand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the Second died; the Hiſtories of thoſe times tell us, that all the bonds, either by the Bed, or by the Book, either by Weddings or Sacramental Oaths, had neither faithfull purpoſe nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giving his Daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Silicia from Pliſtarchus, the Brother of Caſſander, who had gotten it as his ſhare in the diviſion of Antigonus his poſſeſſions: for the Intruder was not ſtrong enough to hold it by his proper forces, from him that entred upon it as a lawfull heir; neither would Seleucus lend him any help, as by the Rule of Confederacy he ſhould have done againſt the common enemy. So Pliſtarchus with very angry complaint, as well againſt Seleucus as Demetrius, went unto Caſſander; whither Phila, their Siſter, followed him ſhortly, to pacifie them both, and keep all quiet; being ſent for that purpoſe by Demetrius her Huſband, that was not ſtrong enough to deal with Caſſander; and therefore glad to make uſe of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his own proſperity, he never took notice to the others good. About the ſame time he took to Wife a Daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of Wives being familiar with theſe Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eaſtern Conqueſts) and ſo was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than ſtrengthened with two friends; for neither of them wiſhed him any good, otherwiſe than might ſeem to advance their own ambitious deſires.

Seleucus and Ptolomy could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with help of their countenance, ſhould ſeek his fortune ſomewhat farther off, than ſettle his eſtate under their noſes. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himſelf: and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed awhile) to the Iſle of Cyprus. Now whether it were ſo, that Seleucus would fain have ſet his new Father-in-law upon the neck of Lyſimachus; or whether he were indeed greedy of the bargain; he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchaſe of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keep as much Land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thouſand talents of his Fathers Treaſure, that would ſerve him to make ſport a while. This refuſal ſo diſpleaſed Seleucus, that in angry terms he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be ſurrendred unto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battel. Inſtead of giving them up, Demetrius took preſent order to have them better manned; and ſpake it ſtoutly, That were he overcome a thouſand times, yet would he not hire Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrel Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant diſpoſition, that would break friendſhip with his Father-in-law for two Towns, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to govern. But the fire conſumed it ſelf in words, which had it faſtned upon arms, like it is that the weaker ſhould have found friends out of envy to the ſtronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius wan the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but loſt in Aſia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Caſſander.

IN the mean while, the Athenians not knowing how to uſe the liberty which Demetrius had beſtowed on them, were fallen by ſedition, under the Tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their diſtempered City was ſo weakned, that it ſeemed ill able to keep off the puniſhment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage haſtened him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to preſent himſelf unto them, in the habit of a revenging fury. He brought againſt them all the force that he could well ſpare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, becauſe his doubtfull Eaſtern friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any buſineſs, that might entangle him in Greece. His firſt enterpriſe in Athens had ill ſucceſs; a great part of his Fleet periſhing in a tempeſt. But he ſoon repaired the loſs; and (after ſome Victories in Peloponneſus, where he wan divers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the enterpriſe, waſted the Country of Attica, and cut off all relief from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it ſtood in a barren ſoil, and wanted now the command of thoſe Iſlands, and places abroad, from from whence it was wont to be ſtored with victuals; being alſo deſtitute of means to keep ſuch a Navy as might bring in ſupply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, againſt that of Demetrius. Yet was there ſome hope of ſuccour from Ptolomy, who (truſting thereby to win the love of Greece) had loaden an hundred and fifty ſhips with Corn, and ſent them to relieve the hungry City. But theſe hundred and fifty were unable to deal with three hundred good fighting-ſhips, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore haſted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come ſo near that they might be deſcryed. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was ſo extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouſe, which dropped down between them from the houſe top. Wherefore they ſent Embaſſadours to yield up the Town, and crave pardon, having ſo far offended, that out of deſperation, they made it a capital offence to propoſe any motion of peace. Yet were they fain to aboliſh this Decree, rather becauſe they knew not what elſe to do, than becauſe they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the Victory, did not only forbear to take away the lives of theſe unthankfull men, which they had ſubmitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, and placed in Office amongſt them ſuch as were moſt acceptable to the people. Nevertheleſs he was grown wiſer than to truſt them ſo far as he had done in times paſt. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Havens, and diſpoſe of them at his pleaſure; he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a ſure Garriſon within their Walls, to keep them honeſt perforce. After this he went into Peloponneſus, vanquiſhed the Lacedæmonians in two Battels, and was in very fair poſſibility to take their City: when the dangerous news of Lyſimachus and Ptolomy, that prevailed faſter upon him elſewhere, than himſelf did upon his enemies in Greece, called him in all haſte. Lyſimachus had won many Towns in Aſia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Iſle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were ſtraitly beſieged. Whileſt he was bethinking himſelf which way to turn his face, a notable piece of buſineſs offered it ſelf, which thruſt all other cares out of his head.

Caſſander was lately dead in Macedon, and ſoon after him, Philip his eldeſt Son, whoſe two younger Brethren, Antipater and Alexander, ſought for the Kingdom. In this quarrel Theſſalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Caſſander had married, ſeemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder Son: who thereupon grew ſo enraged, that moſt barbarouſly he ſlew his own Mother. The odiouſneſs of this fact gave a fair luſtre to Alexanders cauſe: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was ſo ſtrongly backed by Lyſimachus, whoſe Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without ſome foreign aid. For which cauſe he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will ſoon appear in the following Tragedy, of him and his Brother. Their Father Caſſander had been one that ſhifted well for himſelf, at ſuch time as every man ſought how to get ſomewhat, in the ill-ordered diviſion of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing thoſe, whom others would more wiſely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head againſt a wall, upon ſome opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrel, derived from his Father, whom ſhe could not abide. Her feminine malice did ſo exaſperate him, by cruelty that ſhe uſed againſt his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure upon ſhedding the Royall blood: wherewith, when once he had ſtained his hands, he did not care how far he proceeded in that courſe of murder. His carefulneſs to deſtroy thoſe women and children, whoſe lives hindred his purpoſe, argues him to have been rather ſkilfull in matters of Arms, than a valiant man: ſuch cruelty being a true mark of cowardize, which fears a-far off the dangers, that may quietly paſs away: and ſeeks to avoid them by baſe and wicked means, as never thinking it ſelf ſafe enough, until there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be ſaid, that they had well deſerved the bloody end which over-took them; yet ill-beſeemed it Caſſander to do the Office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no Law of men, deſerved to dye for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Caſſander died in his bed, yet the divine Juſtice brought ſwords upon his wife and children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by deſtroying his whole houſe as he had done his Maſters.

Of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Caſſanders Children. Demetrius gets the Kingdom of Macedon; prevails in War againſt the Greeks; loſeth reputation in his War againſt Pyrrhus, and in his Civil Government, and prepares to win Aſia. How all conſpire againſt Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lyſimachus invade him, his Army yields to Pyrrhus, who ſhares the Kingdom of Macedon with Lyſimachus.

Pyrrhus, the Son of that unfortunate Prince Æacides, which periſhed in War againſt Caſſander, was hardly preſerved, being a ſuckling Infant, from the fury of his Fathers enemies. When his Foſterers had conveyed him to Glaucias King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Caſſander would have bought his life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that ſhall be his heir. Glaucias was ſo far from betraying Pyrrhus, that he reſtored him by force to his Fathers Kingdom, when he was but twelve years of age. Within the compaſs of ſix years, either the indiſcretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drave him out of his Kingdom, and left him to try the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his Siſter) became his Page, followed him a while in his Wars, was with him in the great Battel of Ipſus, whence he fled with him to Epheſus; and was content to be hoſtage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he ſo behaved himſelf, that he got the favour of Berenice, Ptolomies principal Wife; ſo that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon ſent home, with money and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdom of Epirus, and was ſettled in it, then fell out that buſineſs between the Children of Caſſander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Caſſanders Sons, was ſo far too weak for Pyrrhus, that he had no deſire to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an haſty agreement, and divided the Kingdom with his younger Brother Alexander; who likewiſe felt the aid of Pyrrhus ſo troubleſome, that he was more willing to ſend him away, than to call in ſuch another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacity to requeſt, or take as granted, by ſtrong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two Brethren to agree as well as they could about the reſt. Neceſſity enforced the Brethren to compoſition: but their compoſition would not ſatisfie Demetrius, who took the matter hainouſly, that he was ſent for, and made a fool to come ſo far with an Army, and finde no work for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpoſe to do as Pyrrhus had done; and ſo much more, by how much he was ſtronger. Hereupon it ſeemed to Alexander a wiſe courſe, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him upon ſome advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the ſtory, and it might be true; though the greateſt part, and perhaps the wiſeſt, believed it not. But the iſſue was, that Alexander himſelf was feaſted and ſlain by Demetrius; who took his part of the Kingdom, as a reward of the murder; excuſing the fact ſo well, by telling his own danger, and what a naughty man Caſſander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the ſame time Lyſimachus was buſied in War with a King of the wild Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to ſeek peace of Demetrius, which to obtain, he cauſed the remainder of Macedon to be given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his Son-in-law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievouſly ſtormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet ſtill he ſtormed; untill his Father-in-law, to ſave the labour of making many excuſes, took away his troubleſome life. Thus in haſte, with a kind of neglect, and as it were to avoid moleſtation, were ſlain the Children of Caſſander: of Caſſander that had ſlain his own Maſters Children, in a wiſe courſe of policy, with carefull meditation (ſo much the more wicked as the more long) ſtudying how to erect his own houſe, that fell down upon his grave, ere the earth on it was throughly ſettled.

It might be thought, that ſuch an acceſs of Dominion, added much to the greatneſs of Demetrius. But indeed it ſhewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of Civil Government: but thought (or ſhewed by his actions that he thought) the uſe and fruit of a Kingdom, to be none other, than to do what a King liſted. He gave himſelf over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at thoſe which offered to trouble him with ſupplications, and the tedious diſcourſe of doing Juſtice. He had more ſkill in getting a Kingdom, than in ruling it: War being his recreation, and Luxury his nature. By long reſt (as ſix years reign is long to him, that knows not how to reign one year) he discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness; and the Souldiers of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomy had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his Mother and Children. This afforded him the better leisure of making War in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his Victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would fain have done somewhat (the peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this Journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made excursions into Thessaly. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrel, seeing Demetrius thought himself strong enough to over-run his enemies Country, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have known raw Novices in that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captain, whom latter Ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he missed that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, shewed in single combate against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The loss of this Battel did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the office of a Captain.

These Rumours were not more nourished by the verrue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their own King; whom they began to disesteem, not so much in regard of his unprofitable Journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Countrey, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his Insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparel seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very unmanly; and serving chiefly to be a daily witness, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his Souldiers lives he was retchless: and suffered unwisely this unprincely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of Justice; and (as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a shew of popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor Suters after him in great hope, till coming to a Bridge, he threw all their Writings into a River; pleasing himself, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost won it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have some feeling of the general hate; which to redress, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on work in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appear; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia with a Royal Army: wherein the fortune of one Battel might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so he might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Horses, with a Navy of five hundred sail, wherein were many ships, far exceeding the greatness of any that had been seen before; yet so swift and useful withall, that the greatness was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomy suspect their own forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyn against this ambitious Son of Antigonus, that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no ſecurity for his friends in Europe, what league ſoever were of old concluded. Therefore they reſolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his own Kingdom. Lyſimachus came firſt, and againſt him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whileſt he was yet on the way, news were brought into his Camp, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhæa. The matter was not overgreat: were it not that minds prepared with long diſcontent, are ready to lay hold upon ſmall occaſions of diſlike. All the Camp was in uproar: ſome wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to utter ſeditious words, and many deſired leave of Demetrius, to go to their own houſes, meaning indeed to have gone to Lyſimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wiſeſt way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lyſimachus their own Country-man, againſt Pyrrhus that was a ſtranger: hoping by victory againſt the Epirot, to recover the love of his followers, in ſuch ſort that he might afterwards at leiſure deal with the other. But herein his wiſdom beguiled him. For the ſouldiers were as haſty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to ſee that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some ſpake of his valour; ſome enquired, others anſwered, of his perſon, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be known; as particularly, by a pair of Goats-horns, that he wore on his creſt. It was not likely, that theſe men ſhould hurt him. Divers of them ſtole away, and ran over into Pyrrhus his Camp: where the news that they brought, were better welcome than their perſons. For they ſaid, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get ſight of Pyrrhus, they would all ſalute him King. To try this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and preſented himſelf bare-headed in view of the Camp, whither ſome were ſent before to prepare his welcome. The news of his arrival found a general applauſe, and every one began to look out, with deſire to ſet eye on him. His face was not ſo well known as his Helmet; therefore he was admoniſhed to put it on: which done, all came about him, and proffered their ſervice; neither were there any, that ſpake for Demetrius; only ſome (and they the moſt moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and ſhift for himſelf. So Demetrius threw aſide his Maſkers habit, and attyring himſelf poorly, did fearfully ſteal away out of his own Camp, deſerving well this calamity: whether it were ſo, that he would not hearken to the good counſel of his friends; or whether his behaviour deprived him of ſuch friends, as would dare to let him hear the unpleaſant ſound of neceſſary truth.

Whileſt Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdom of Macedon; Lyſimachus came upon him very unſeaſonably, and would needs have half: ſaying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the War; and therefore had reaſon to challenge his part of the gain. The bargain was quickly made, and the diviſion agreed upon: each of them being rather deſirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to work his fellow quite out of all, upon better opportunity.

§. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering Forces, enterpriſed many things with ill ſucceſs, in Greece and Aſia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yield himſelf. His impriſonment and death.

THE Athenians were as unthankfull to Demetrius in this his adverſity, as they had been in former times. For they preſently forſook his friendſhip, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went againſt Lyſimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, under his Son Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had ſoon gotten an Army, though Phila his Wife (who is highly commended for a wiſe and vertuous Lady) did poyſon her ſelf, upon deſperate grief for his misfortune. The firſt, upon whom he attempted to ſhew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deſerved it. He began to lay ſiege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philoſopher, whom they had made their ſpokes-man; and taking fair words inſtead of ſatisfaction, paſſed over into Aſia, with eleven thouſand Souldiers, meaning to try his fortune againſt Lyſimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his firſt coming into thoſe parts, fortune ſeemed to ſmile upon him. For many good Towns, willingly, or by compulſion, yielded to his obedience. There were alſo ſome Captains that fell from Lyſimachus to him, with their companies and treaſures. But it was not long ere Agathocles the Son of Lyſimachus, came upon him with an Army ſo ſtrong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his laſt ſtock againſt it.

Wherefore he resolved to pass through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to find a Kingdom somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsel was grievously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which wayes he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: nevertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titulary King, with extream famine. At length, in passing the river Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travel with such speed as might well be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of war, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest with their Captain, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claim to the Country; but with vehement and humble Letters he besought his Son-in-law to call to mind their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These Letters at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himself, when he recovered strength after the battel at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none took effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore meer desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness took and held him forty days, in which time, a great number of his few men ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by Fugitives, that gave alarm. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsook him) to yield unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his own humanity by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a demy-Island, wherein were goodly Walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countreys. In this sort he spent three years, now merrily all the while (as one that living enjoyed the happiness, which with so much travel and blood-shed, he had sought in vain) and then dyed, leaving to his Son Antigonus, the same which his Father had left unto himself; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it self hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was the last of Alexanders Captains: with other occurrences.

ABout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, war-like, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines, many Children, out of whom he selected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and caused him to reign together with himself, two or three years before he died, that so he might confirm him in the Inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolomy Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomy) was grievously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captains left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrel, was their neer equality or strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest Son: whose wife and children fled unto Seleucus for aid.

The Macedons, after seven moneths pause, having spent their first heat of admiration, began to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their natural Countrey-man, that they forsook Pyrrhus, upon none other ground than becauſe he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gave him. Lyſimachus had reigned about five years alone, when the City of Lyſimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared by events, to have foreſhewed the fall of his houſe. His own jealouſie, and the inſtigation of a mother-in-law, cauſed him to poyſon his ſon Agathocles; which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the loſs of all his fifteen Children that were taken away by divers accidents) he periſhed himſelf.

Seleucus was encountred by Lyſimachus on Aſia ſide, where one battell concluded the war, with Lyſimachus his death. It pleaſed Seleucus more than the victory, that he was the laſt of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he ſeemed to himſelf as Lord and Heir of all the conquered World. So he paſſed over into Macedon, to take poſſeſſion of Europe, where there was none to withſtand him. But here he ended his days, and within ſeven moneths followed Lyſimachus, and others of his fellows, by a bloody death, being treacherouſly ſlain by Ptolomy Ceraunus, whoſe friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and ſeven year old he was, when he fought with Lyſimachus, and Lyſimachus was ſeventy and four. With them ended the generation of old Captains, that had ſeen the dayes as it were of another World under the Perſian: yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of War: even Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we ſpake before; that is now ready to enter into war with the Romans, a more warlike people than Alexander himſelf did ever encounter. Of which war, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a ſtory more important, than any likely to enſue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms that were held by Alexanders Succeſſors, with leſs (and ſtill decreaſing) vertue, than was that, by which they were firſt purchaſed.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome, and ſettling of the Eaſtern Kingdoms.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hoſtilius, unto ſuch time as they were aſſailed by Pyrrhus.

HOw Rome was founded by Romulus; ſettled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many (though ſmall) Victories, gathered ſtrength, unto ſuch time as it became the Head of Latium, by the conqueſt of Alba, in the Reign of Tullus Hoſtilius: it hath been already noted in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatneſs beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it ſelf out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like caſes I have done) briefly to ſet down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of thoſe many actions, which could not have been delivered in the ages, wherein they were ſeverally performed, without much interruption of the Hiſtory, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hoſtilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his houſe by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-childe to Numa Pompilius by his Daughter, and not much unlike him in diſpoſition, ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about; enlarged it with the Hill Aventine, which he encloſed; built a bridge over Tybris, and the City of Oſtia upon the Sea, ſixteen miles diſtant from Rome. Finally, having reigned 24 years, he dyed, and by his laſt Will he left his Children in charge with one Lucumon, the ſon of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypſelus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of which Town he was afterward called Tarquinius. From that City in Hetruria coming to Rome, and encouraged by ſome ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tanaquils propheſie, pheſie, he grew a favourite of Ancus Martius; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, inſomuch, that after his deceaſe he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centurions of Horſemen: neither was he leſs eminent in war, than in peace: for he prevailed often againſt the Tuſcans, and from his victories, the chiefeſt ornaments of triumph took their original. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned 38. years, he was ſlain by the Sons of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and ſick, but not dangerouſly. And withall ſignified unto them, that in the interim of his ſickneſs, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth ſhe alwayes propheſied to be born to great hopes (the ſon of P. Corniculanus, and Ocriſia a well deſcended, but captive woman) brought up in her houſe, and husband unto her daughter, ſhould ſupply her husbands place, in governing the State, untill his recovery: which government, being thus at firſt obtained by cunning, he afterwards uſurped as his right. He firſt ordained Ratements, Subſidies and Valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourſcore-thouſand were muſtered, of which number conſiſted their whole Corporation; and by diſtinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good ſort, as if it had been a private houſhold. At length, haveing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding alſo that the two ſons of Tarquinius Priſcus, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed unto his tuition, were of different diſpoſitions, proportionably anſwering to his daughters; he (willing to add water, not oyl, to fire) gave the mild daughter to Sextus the hot-headed ſon, and the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courſes, or by accident, it hapned; the two mild ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joyned in marriage: who ſoon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom. Upon this tumult, Servius Tullius haſtening to the Senate, (where he thought by Authority to have bridled Inſolency) was thrown down the ſtairs, and going home ſore bruiſed, was ſlain by the way, when he had reigned 44 years. Then Tullia his daughter, firſt proclaiming her Husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home enforced her Coachman to drive his Chariot over her fathers corps: whereupon the ſtreet had the denomination of Wicked-ſtreet. This Tarquine, exerciſing cruelty without juſtice, and tyranny without mercy, upon the people and Senators; having tired himſelf and them at home, uſed the ſame rage of treachery upon his borders. He took Oriculum, Sueſſa, Pometia, and the Gabii. The iſſue of beſieging Ardea, a Town eighteen mile diſtant from Rome, was of bad ſucceſs. In the heat of which War, his Son Sextus Tarquinius violently raviſhed that chaſte Lady Lucretia, his kinſman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for ſo unchaſte a deed, thought good to waſh out thoſe ſpots of infamy with her own blood; ſo (having firſt bequeathed the revenge unto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine and Junius Brutus) ſhe kill'd her ſelf: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his reſolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depoſed and baniſhed; and fled to Porſenna King of Hetruria for ſuccour, in the five and twentieth year of his reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which ſpace Rome had ſcarce gotten poſſeſſion of fifteen miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his Country from that heavy yoke of bondage, inforced the people by ſolemn oath, never to admit any government by Kings amongſt them: whereupon they ranſacked their Kings goods, conſecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But becauſe the name of King was odious in their ears, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetual to annual, and from a ſingle Government to a double; leſt perpetual or ſole dominion might be ſome motive to uſurpation; and inſtead of Kings they called them Conſuls, ſignifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwayes mindfull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it ſo hard ſetling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, ſcarce daring to aſſure themſelves of their own ſecurity, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to reſign up his authority, fearing that tyranny would be hereditary, and ſuppoſing that the very name and affinity with the houſe of Tarquine, ſavoured already of their condition. In his room was ſubſtitute Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gave liberty, in matters of controverſie to appeal from the Conſuls to the people, and that he might as well in goods as in perſon, avoid occaſion of ſuſpition, cauſed his own houſe to be pulled down, becauſe it was built in a place defenſible, as if it had been a Cittadel. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples ſafety, as their favour: for having got intelligence, that ſome greener wits, and in the firſt rank his own ſons, were itching after innovations, hoping to reſtore the baniſhed Kings; he cauſed them, publickly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpartially to the block.

Hitherto the Romans, having by the unblemiſhed integrity of Brutus, well appeaſed all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imployed their military deſignments againſt Forraigners: firſt, for their liberty; ſecondly, for inlarging of their poſſeſſions; and laſtly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, ſituated as it were in the mid-way between Latium and the Tuſcans, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but give occaſion of offence to her neighbours; untill by main oppoſition, having prevailed againſt her borderers, ſhe uſed them as inſtruments, whereby to obtain the reſt.

Their firſt war, in the firſt year of Conſuls, was againſt Porſenna King of Hetruria: who being over-perſwaded by Tarquins lamentation, came to Rome, together with the baniſhed King, and with great forces, to ſeat him again in his Kingdom.

In the firſt conflict, Horatius Cocles, having long time born the main brunt of his enemies on the Bridge over Tibris, at length, feeling himſelf too faint to ſtand againſt ſo many, cauſed the bridge behinde him to be broken down, and with his armour leaping into the River, like a hunted Stagg, refreſhed his hot ſpirits, and returned ſafe to his fellows, with the like reſolution to ſuſtain a new charge. Porſenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance into the City, and found the Victory, in a manner, aſſuredly his own: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the conſtant reſolution of Mutius Scævola (who having by errour ſlain Porſenna his Secretary, in ſtead of the King himſelf, did in ſcorn of torments threatned, burn off his own hand) he thought it not any whit prejudicial either to his ſafety, or credit, to enter league with them at the worſt hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his ſpleen was not quite abated, though Arruns his Son, and Brutus, his enemy, in ſingle combat, had ſlain each other. And here the Romans, although they loſt, Brutus got the field; and their Ladies, whoſe Champion he was, for their chaſtity, not for beauty, mourned the loſs of him one whole year. Into this place, for the reſidue of his year, was ſubrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his room (deceaſing naturally before the year expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquin, upon his overthrow, feeling the fates diſaſtrous, thought it no boot to ſtrive againſt the ſtream, but ſpent the reſidue of his time, which was about fourteen years, privately at Tuſculum. Yet his Son-in-law Mamilius Tuſculanus, ſtomaching a-freſh at thoſe old repulſes, becauſe Porſenna had made peace with the Romans, and denyed further ſuccour unto the Tarquines, muſtered up his Latins, and gave battel to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the iſſue uncertain, untill Aulus Poſthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magiſtracy greater than Conſuls, purpoſely for this war, when firſt it was expected) to exaſperate his Souldiers courage, threw their own Enſigns amidſt the Enemies; and Coſſus, or Spurius Caſſius, (Maſter of the Horſe-men, an aſſiſtant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Enſigns. This fight was ſo well performed, that a report went of Caſtor and Pollux, two gods, who came on milk-white Steeds, to be eye-witneſſes of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their Victory; for the General conſecrated a Temple to them, as a ſtipend for their pains. After this the Romans fierce ſpirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themſelves at home; and the ſixteenth year after the Kings expulſion, upon inſtigation of ſome deſperate banckrouts, thinking themſelves wrongfully oppreſſed by the Senate and Conſuls, they made an uproar in the holy Mount; untill by Menenius Agrippa, his diſcreet alluſion, of the inconvenience in the Head and Belly's diſcord, to that preſent occaſion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have ſome new Magiſtrates created, to whom they might appeal in caſes of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controverſies, the Conſuls authority notwithſtanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among themſelves, themſelves, they had continual War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Among theſe, the Volſci and Æqui held them longeſt; who made War of themſelves upon the Romans: whereby they loſt the beſt City in their whole juriſdiction, Corioli.

In this conqueſt, T. Martius got the ſurname of Coriolanus: a name honourable then, as drawn from a great Victory; although, by reaſon of the poverty of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would have been aſhamed of that title. But yet theſe graces had been no occaſion of diſparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, adviſed to ſell corn, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalf, accuſed him, and after judgement baniſhed him. Coriolanus flying to the Volſci, whom lately before he had vanquiſhed, incenſed them to renew their forces again; which being committed unto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, ſo far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made ſo ſharp war, and was at ſuch defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any ſupplication of Embaſſadours, untill his mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pitifull tune of deprecation, ſhewing themſelves better Subjects to their Country than friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome than was any force of Arms. Hereupon Coriolanus diſmiſſing his Army, was after put to death among the Volſci, as a Traitor, for neglecting ſuch opportunity: or (as others ſurmiſe) living with them untill old age, he died naturally.

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans; againſt whom the Fabii, three hundred and ſix in number, all of one Family, intreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had been in a private quarrel. Theſe Fabii, after ſome good ſervices, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumvented, and all ſlain: one only of that whole houſe had been left, by reaſon of infancy, at home; from whom afterward ſprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquiſhed Hannibal.

In proceſs of time, the Romans were alſo troubled with the Volſci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Conſul, with his whole Army, had been diſcomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus choſen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the higheſt honour in Rome, with ſucceſs anſwerable to his expedition, diſperſed his enemies, and freed his Country in the ſpace of ſixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volſcian war, it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before choſen Governours of the State, and Inactors of Solons Laws amongſt them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Conſuls, and all other Magiſtrates) would have raviſhed Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captain of a company, and lying then in a Camp at Algidum. Hereupon the people in an uproar took the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to reſign up their authority again to new Conſuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or deſire to revenge old loſſes, drew the Romans into a new war againſt the Veientes and their adherents, upon whom, having tried their forces with diverſity of Captains, and variety of event, they vanquiſhed the Faliſci, and the Fidenates, and utterly ſubdued the Veientes. In conquering the Faliſci, Furius Camillus ſhewed no leſs integrity than fortitude. For when a Schoolmaſter, by training forth into the Roman camp, many children of the principal Citizens, thought to betray the Town, yielding them all up as hoſtages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Souldiers, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forthwith yielded unto him in reverence of his juſtice. The ſiege of Veii was ten years, and ſo troubleſome, that the Romans were there firſt inforced to winter abroad under beaſts ſkins (to which they were the more eaſily induced, becauſe then firſt they received pay) and to make vows never to return without Victory.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got ſo large ſpoils, that they conſecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: and the whole people in general were called to the ranſacking of the City. But yet they were no leſs unthankfull to Camillus for his ſervice, than before they had been to Coriolanus; for they baniſhed him the City, upon ſome occaſion of inequality in dividing the ſpoils: yet he requited their unkindneſs with a new piece of ſervice againſt the fury of the Gauls; who being a populous Countrey, and very healthfull, the fathers (as ſometimes now) lived ſo long, that the ſons deſtitute of means, were enforced to roave abroad, ſeeking ſome place where to ſet up their reſt: and withall being a Nation vaſte in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, ſet upon Cluſium a Town in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information (and being careful of her Confederate Towns) ſent Embaſſadours, warning them to deſiſt from ſuch injurious enterpriſes. But the barbarous people, not regarding the meſſage, upon ſome injury offered by the Roman Embaſſadours, converted their forces from Cluſium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the ſixteenth day before the Calends of Auguſt (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Allienſis in the Roman Kalendar) they haſtned towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of miſery and deſolation. For ſome leaving the City; ſome creeping into holes; Prieſts hiding their reliques; and, every one ſhifting for himſelf ere the enemy came, Rome was abandoned as indefenſible. The Veſtal Virgins, in this tumult, were ſafely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldneſs out of deſperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did ſet themſelves in Thrones, in their ſeveral houſes, hourly expecting the meſſengers of death, and meaning to dye, as they had lived, in State. The younger ſort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitol.

By this the Gauls were entred the City, who ſeeing all quiet, at firſt ſuſpected ſome ambuſh; afterward finding all ſecure, they fell to the ſpoil, committing all to the fire and ſword. As for the old Senators, they ſate in their Majeſty with a grave reſolution; having firſt reverenced them as gods, anon they tryed whether they would dye like men. When the City was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitol: which held them work for the ſpace of ſeven months. Once they were like to have ſurpriſed it by night, but being deſcried by the gaggling of Geeſe, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a compoſition was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls ſhould take a thouſand pound weight in gold, to deſiſt from their ſiege. Whileſt the gold was in weighing, the Gauls, with open inſolency, made their weights too heavy: Brennus their Captain, caſting his ſword into the ballance, and with a proud exprobration, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed muſt be patient perforce. But in the midſt of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardæa, (where he had lived in his baniſhment) and fell upon the Gauls with ſuch violence, that he diſperſed their troops, quenched the fire of the City with their blood, forcing them to reſtore the ſpoils with advantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which they had lately been ſo nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he ſo hotly purſued them thorow a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which eſcaped from him, was very ſmall. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this firſt, had the like ill ſucceſs. They were often beaten by the Romans; eſpecially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in ſingle fight ſlew a ſeveral Champion of the Gauls) abated their preſumption, and reſtored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable ſervice, was afterwards accounted a ſecond Romulus.

The people, after this deſtruction of their City, were earneſtly bent to go to the Veii to inhabit; but Camillus diſſwaded them.

About the ſame time, ſomewhat before the ſiege of Veii they changed their government from Conſuls to military Tribunes. The government of theſe alſo, after ſome years, was by civil diſſention interrupted: ſo that one while Conſuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchy. Then the Tribunes were reſtored and ruled again, till, after many years expired, the Conſular authority was eſtabliſhed, it being enacted, that one of the Conſuls ſhould alwayes be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365 years. And now Rome, by ſuppreſſion of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares ſet forth againſt the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almoſt one hundred and thirty miles off: ſituated between Campania and Apulia. Theſe did ſo ſtrongly invade the Campanians their neighbours, that they forced them to yield themſelves ſubjects to Rome, and undergo any conditions of Tribute, or whatſoever elſe to obtain protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fiſh, ſhould devour the leſs, eaſily allowed of; aiming themſelves at the good ſituation of Campania, the abundance of Corn and Wine, pleaſant Cities and Towns, but eſpecially Capua it ſelf, the faireſt City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papyrii and Fabii were moſt imployed in the managing of this War, which endured the ſpace of fifty years. And in this ſeaſon were the Romans often times dangerouſly encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Poſthumius were Conſuls, and diſcomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no ſmall ignominy: and when Q. Fabius Gurges loſt the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great Victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrel. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but less warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long war it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latins began to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latins was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latin Colony; besides all which, they made offer to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. So a great battel was fought between them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius Torquatus and the elder Decius were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the General in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consul exposed his life to the enemy, and purchased victory (as was believed) by his death. In which kind of devoting himself for his Army, the son of this Decius being after Consul, did imitate his father in the Hetrurian war. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchased victory, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a Religion, as required the lives of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Country. The discipline of Manlius was no less resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caused his own son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Latins, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latins, the Æqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to try their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, wasting all their Country with fire and sword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made trial of the Roman arms, were the Tarentines and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as mediatours between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War, unto that party which should dare to refuse peace by them tendred. These threats which discovered their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrel was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadours unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadours, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebell and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their own weakness. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aid (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already in a manner it did over-spread.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battels.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deal with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no less than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive war upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Towns, with the remainder of his Fathers Army and treasures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imployment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other aid aid than his good conduct, which to obtain, they would caſt themſelves under his protection. They had in their company ſome of the Samnites, Lucanians, Meſſapians, and others; which promiſed, in behalf of their ſeveral Nations, as much as could be deſired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conqueſts; that he might enlarge his Empire to the Weſt, as far as Alexander had gotten Eaſtward; and ſtill by one victory open the gate unto another. To which effect it is ſaid, that once he anſwered Cyneas his chief Counſellour, aſking what he meant to do after every of the victories which he hoped to get: that having won Rome, he would ſoon be Maſter of all Italy; that, after Italy he would quickly get the Iſle of Sicil; that, out of Sicil, he would paſs over into Affrick, and win Carthage, with all the reſt of the Countrey; and being ſtrengthened with the force of all theſe Provinces, he would be too hard for any of thoſe that were now ſo proud and troubleſome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they ſhould do, when they were Lords of all. Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) anſwered pleaſantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they preſently might do, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Nevertheleſs, this Italian Expedition ſeemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of ſuch conſequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any ſcholaſtical diſputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almoſt thirty thouſand men, well ſorted, and well trained ſouldiers: part of which he ſent over before him under Cyneas, with the reſt he followed in perſon. At his coming, he found the Tarentines, very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, utterly careleſs to provide for the war. Wherefore he was fain to ſhut up their Theatre, and other places of pleaſure and reſort, enforcing them to take arms, and making ſuch a ſtrict muſter, as was to them very unpleaſing, though greatly behooving to their eſtate.

Whilſt he was occupied with theſe cares, Lævinus the Roman Conſul drew near, and began to waſte Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Countrey; the Samnites were careleſs of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themſelves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their valour was little: all of theſe had been accuſtomed to ſhrink for fear of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own forces: than the iſſue of their vaunting promiſes. He was now driven either to ſet forward with thoſe that himſelf had brought into Italy, and the aſſiſtance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be repoſed; or elſe to weaken the reputation of his own ſufficiency, which by all means he was careful to uphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been ſcattered by foul weather at Sea, were ſafely come to him: with which he reſolved to aſſay the valour of the Romans, againſt whom he proudly marched.

Lævinus the Conſul was not affrighted with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battel ere all his adherents ſhould be ready to joyn with him. This boldneſs of the Roman, and the ſlackneſs of the Meſſapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger moſt concerned, cauſed Pyrrhus, to offer a treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrel between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Camp; or whether, conſidering better at near diſtance, the weight of the buſineſs which he had taken in hand, he were deſirous to quit it with his honour; the ſhort anſwer that was returned to his propoſition, gave him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans ſent him this word, that they had neither choſen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon both Armies haſtned their march unto the River of Siris: Lævinus intending to fight before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from paſſing that River, until his own Army were full. Upon the firſt view of the Roman Camp, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a brave diſcipline of War: which cauſed him to ſet a ſtrong Corps de garde upon the paſſage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, until he ſaw his beſt advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skilful in the Art of War, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Army entred the Foord, in face of his Corpſe de garde; and their horſe, at the ſame time began to paſs the River in ſundry places: which cauſed the Greeks to forſake the defence of their bank, and ſpeedily retire unto their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to battel; wherewith he thought it beſt to preſent them, ere the whole Army had recovered firm footing, and were in order. So directing his Captains how to marshal his battels; himself with the horse charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duty of a careful General; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personal valour. It behooved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slain under him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the use of his Kings armour, which was torn from his back. This accident had almost lost him the battel; but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater loss (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as only spear and sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose unusual form and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustain; then was the victory quickly gotten. For the Roman battels, perceiving their horse put to the rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flank, and over-born, by the force and huge bulk of those strange beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: in which consternation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victory was soon spread over Italy; and the reputation was no less than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, with a select Army, should lose in plain battel, not only the Field, but the Camp it self, being so notably fortified as they alwayes were. And this honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, save the unwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for coming (as we say) a day after the Fair. Nevertheless he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cyneas his Embassadour, demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himself accepted as their especial friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their captives, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senator, did stir them up to make good their honour by war. So they returned answer, that whilest Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cyneas made at his return, of the Roman puissance and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacy with that gallant City. Hereupon many kind Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of peace, the answer was; He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the mean season, each part made provision for war; the Romans levying a more mighty Army than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access unto his forces of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to the trial of a second battel, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a second victory. But this was not altogether so joyfull as the former had been: rather it gave him cause to say, that such another victory would be his utter undoing. For he had lost the flower of his Army in this battel: and though he drave the Romans into their Camp, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of prevailing against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilest he should be driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should alwayes stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight would soon teach the Romans, that were apt Scholars in such learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy: which to do (seeing the Romans would not help him, by offering or accepting any fair conditions of peace, or of truce) he took a slight occasion, preſented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

on,

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicil. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicil, forſook Italy; won the moſt of the Iſle; and loſt it in ſhort ſpace. Pyrrhus returns into Italy, where he is beaten by the Romans, and ſo goes back to his own Kingdom.

WHen Ptolomy Ceraunus had traiterouſly murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he preſently ſeized upon all the Dominions of Lyſimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward unto him, that had ſlain the Conquerour. The houſes of Caſſander and Lyſimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of ſtrength and reputation enough to advance himſelf againſt Ceraunus. The friends of Lyſimachus were rather pleaſed to have him their King, that had (as he profeſſed) revenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiouſneſs of his fact, by which they were freed from ſubjection, to one, againſt whom they had ſtood in oppoſition. Many there were, that upon remembrance of his fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perſwading themſelves that his reign might prove good, though his entrance had been wicked. Theſe affections of the Macedonians did ſerve to defeat Antigonus the ſon of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdom. As for Antigonus the ſon of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be queſtioned about ſome part of Aſia, ere he ſhould be able to bring an Army neer unto Europe. Yet he made great ſhew of meaning to revenge his Fathers death: but being ſtronger in money than in arms, he was content, after a while, to take fair words, and make peace with the murtherer. While theſe three ſtrove about the Kingdom, Pyrrhus, who thought his claim as good as any of theirs, made uſe of their diſſention: threatning war, or promiſing his aſſiſtance to every one of them. By theſe means he ſtrengthened himſelf, and greatly advantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requeſting money of Antiochus, ſhips of Antigonus, and ſouldiers of Ptolomy, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a ſtrong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to have them reſtored at two years end) more for fear than for love: that ſo he might free himſelf from trouble, and quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolomy grew mighty on the ſudden; and the power that by wicked means he had gotten, by means as wicked he encreaſed.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the ſtrong City of Caſſandria was held by Arſinoe his ſiſter, the widow of Lyſimachus, who lay therein with her young children. Her he circumvented by making love to her, and (according to the faſhion of thoſe times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of conſanguinity) taking her to wife, with promiſe to adopt her children: a promiſe that he meant not to perform; for it was not long, ere he ſlew them, and drave her into exile.

In the pride of this good ſucceſs, which his villany found, vengeance came upon him from a far, by the fury of a Nation that he never heard of. Belgius a Captain of the Gauls, having forced his paſſage through many Countreys, unto the confines of Macedon, ſent a proud meſſage to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwiſe, to look for all the miſeries of war. Theſe Gauls were the race of thoſe, that iſſued out of their Countrey, to ſeek new ſeats in that great expedition, wherein Brennus took and burnt the City of Rome. They had divided themſelves, at their ſetting forth, into two companies; of which the one fell upon Italy; the other, paſſing through the Countreys that lye on the Northern ſide of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeem peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceraunus to do: unto whoſe borders they came about an hundred and eight years after ſuch time as their fellows had taken Rome.

When their Embaſſadours came to Ptolomy, aſking what he would give: his anſwer was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it muſt be with condition, that they ſhould put into his hands their Princes as hoſtages, and yield up their arms; otherwiſe he would neither pardon their boldneſs, nor give any credit to their words. At this anſwer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; ſaying, That they would ſoon confute with deeds, the vanity of ſuch proud words. It may ſeem ſtrange, that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus, for very fear; ſhould be ſo confident in undertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardanians offered to lend him twenty thouſand men againſt the Gauls: but he ſcorned the offer; ſaying, That he had the children of thoſe, which under der the conduct of Alexander had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against all the barbarous people with his famous Macedonians, as if the Victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great Name. But he soon found his great errour when it was too late. For the Enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and fierceness of courage, but so far superiour to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their fury. Ptolomy himself grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilest the battel continued; and they presently strook off his head, which they shewed to his men on the top of a Lance, to their utter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Towns, and abandoned the whole Country as lost. Only Sosthenes, a valiant Captain, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper-hand, and hindred Belgius from using the Victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a General. But (as mischiefs do seldom come alone) the good success of Belgius drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captain of the Gauls, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; against which mighty Army, when Sosthenes with his weak troops made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians again compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leaving all their Countrey to the spoil of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of, in less than fifty years after the death of Alexander, who sought to discover and subdue unknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these news been carried to Pyrrhus in Italy, who sought a fair pretext of relinquishing his War with the Romans; had not other tydings out of Sicil distracted him, and carried him away in pursuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned over the whole Island, the Carthaginians sent an Army to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had been expelled. This Army did so fast prevail, that the Silicians had no other hope to avoid slavery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to live under the well-known heavy yoak of Carthage. To him therefore the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principal Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadours, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so unluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the business of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he believed (as came after to pass) that his advantage upon Macedon would not so hastily pass away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it at better leisure; over into Sicil he transported his Army, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Town to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italy was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature advice; so were his actions following, untill his return into Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well-ordered, or noteworthy. The Army which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soon after his descent into Sicil, he forc't the Carthaginians out of all, in effect, that they had therein. He also won the strong City of Eryx; and having beaten the Mamertines in battel, he began to change condition, and turn Tyrant. For he drave Sostratus (to whom this cruelty was suspected) out of the Island, and put Thenon of Siracuse to death, being jealous of his greatness; which two persons had faithfully served him, and delivered the great and rich City of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he served himself, and salved the disreputation of his leaving Sicil, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present help against the Romans, who since his leaving Italy, had well-neer dispossest them of all that they had.

Taking this fair occasion, he imbarked for Italy; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italy it self, by eighteen hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Country. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battel with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forc't him out of Italy into his own Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than constant; and had he been but a General of an Army for some other great King or State, and had had been directed to have conquered any one Country or Kingdom, it is to be thought, that he would have purchased no less honour, than any man of War, either preceding or succeding him; for a greater Captain, or a valianter man, hath be n no where found. But he never stayed upon any enterprise; which was, indeed, the disease he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IV.

How Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pyrrhus won the Kingdom of Macedon from Antigonus.

THE vertue of Sosthenes being too weak to defend the Kingdom of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no less glad to submit themselves unto the government of Antigonus, than they had been formerly desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrius. His coming into the Country with an Army, Navy, and Treasure beseeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to use against the Barbarians, only those forces which he brought with him, having none other than good wishes of the Macedons to take his part. Brennus with the main strength of his Army, was gone to spoil the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behinde him, than he thought necessary to guard the borders of Macedon and Pannonia; which were about fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fellows: and therefore sent unto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation by condescending to their proud demands: yet he judged it unfit to exasperate their furious choler, by uncourteous words or usage, as Ceraunus had over-fondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Embassadours in very loving and sumptuous manner, with a royal feast: wherein he exposed to their view such abundance of massie gold and silver, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was served. He thought hereby to make them understand how great a Prince he was, and how able if need required, to wage a mighty Army.

To which end, he likewise did shew unto them his Camp and Navy, but especially his Elephants. But all this bravery served only to kindle their greedy appetites; who seeing his ships heavy loaden, his Camp full of wealth, and ill fortified, himself (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage, inferiour unto the Gauls, thought all time lost wherein they suffered the present possessors to spend the riches which they accounted assuredly their own. They returned therefore to their companions with none other news in their mouths, than of spoil and purchase: which tale carried the Gauls head-long to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater booty, than the victory over Ceraunus had given to Belgius. Their coming was terrible and sudden; yet not so sudden, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who distrusting the courage of his own men, dislodged somewhat before their arrival, and conveyed himself, with his whole Army and Carriage, into certain woods adjoyning, where he lay close.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not hasty to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the empty Cabbins of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched every place in vain, angry at their lost labour, they marched with all speed towards the Sea-side; that they might fall upon him, whilst he was busie in getting his Men and Carriages a ship-board. But the success was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were so careless of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoil of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Army had left Antigonus, where he lay in covert; and had saved it self by getting aboard the Fleet: in which number were some well-experienced men of War: who discovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, took courage, and encouraged others to lay manly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resoluti[illegible] gave so brave a charge upon the disordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldness was thereby changed into sudden fear, and they, after a great slaughter, driven to cast themselves into the service of Antigonus.

The fame of this Victory caused all the barbarous barbarous Nations in those quarters to re-entertain their ancient belief of the Macedonian valour: by which the terrible and resistless oppressors of so many Countries were overthrown.

To speak more of the Gauls in this place, and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the less, with their wars and conquests there; I hold it needless: the victorious Armies of the Romans taming them hereafter in the Countries which now they wan, shall give better occasion to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoever the good success of Antigonus got him reputation among the barbarous people; yet his own Souldiers, that without his leading had won this Victory, could not thereupon be perswaded to think him a good man of war: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appear) was greatly helpfull unto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affairs in Italy stood upon hard terms, had sent unto Antigonus for help: not without threats, in case it were denyed. So was he sure to get either a supply, wherewith to continue his War against the Romans; or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italy, under colour of making his word good, in seeking revenge. The threats which he had used in bravery, meer necessity forced him at his return into Epirus, to put in practice.

He brought home with him eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an Army too little to be employed, by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keep in pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon; intending to take what spoil he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this business, two thousand of Antigonus his souldiers revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince to set upon Antigonus himself, and to hazard his fortune, in trial of a Battel, for the whole Kingdom of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to weary him out of the Country. For Pyrrhus overtook him in a streight passage, and charged him in the rear; wherein were the Gauls and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength; a manifest proof that he was in retrait. The Gauls very bravely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slain) after a sharp fight: wherein it seems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not advancing to their succour, took away their courage, by deceiving their expectation. The Captains of the Elephants were taken soon after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldened Pyrrhus to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seen so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered so well their affections, that he adventured to draw near in person, and exhort them to yield. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader refused to become his follower. All forsook Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and mony enough to entertain a greater power, had he known where to levy it. But whilst he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his service; whereby he might repair his loss: Ptolomy, the Son of Pyrrhus, came upon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, drave him to flie from the parts about Macedon, to those Towns afar off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himself a King.

This good success revived the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow of his late mis-fortunes in the Roman War: so that he sent for his Son Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without success. His enterprise upon Argos, and his death.

Pyrrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gauls, and beaten Antigonus, and
